^e Annas, who by Josephus is called Ananus, had been high-priest, enjoying that dignity for eleven years; and even after he was deposed, retained still the title, and had a great share of the management of all public affairs. When John the Baptist entered upon the exercise of his ministry, he is called the high-priest in conjunction with Caiaphas, (Luke iii. 2.) though at this time, he did not act in this character; and when our Saviour was apprehended, he was first brought to his house, according to St John, (chap. xviii. 13, 14.) though the other evangelists pass that over in silence, because there was nothing done to him there, and looks as if he were only there detained until the

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15.—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

the high-priest, and had formerly borne the same office : but Annas sent him to Caiaphas, in whose palace the Sanhedrim was still sitting, even though it was thus late at night. Caiaphas examined him a great deal concerning both his doctrine and disciples ; but when our Saviour answered, ‘ That since he had always taught in the most public manner in the synagogues, and in the temple, ^a he should rather inquire of those who had been his constant hearers, an officer ^b standing by gave him a blow on the face, pretending that he had not used the high-priest with respect enough ; to which our Lord only replied, that ^c ‘ if he had said any thing amiss, the law was open, and he might plead him, but if not, ^e he had no cause or authority to strike him.’

The council perceiving that, from his own confession, they could raise no accusation against him, called over the false witnesses that they had procured ; but these either disagreed in their stories, or came not sufficiently up to the point. Two persons indeed were consistent in what they deposed, namely, that they had heard him say, ‘ that he would pull down the temple of God, and in three days rebuild it.’ But as this accusation ² was false in fact, and founded only upon a figurative expression of our Saviour’s, it was not thought to amount to any thing capital.

All this while our Saviour made no manner of reply to the evidences that were produced against him ; whereof when the high-priest asked him the reason, and still he continued silent, having one question more in reserve, which, if he answered in the negative, would, according to his notion, make him an impostor, if in the affirmative, a blasphemer, he stood up, and, in the name of the living God, ^d ‘ adjured him to declare, whether he was the Messiah, the Son of God, or not?’ The reverence which our Lord paid to that sacred name, made him immediately answer, and that in direct terms, ‘ That he was ; and that of this they would be convinced, when they should see him sitting on the right-hand of the Almighty, and coming in the clouds of heaven.’ Whereupon the high-priest, in testimony of his abhorrence, rent his clothes, ^e as if he had heard the grossest blasphemy, ^f and then, addressing himself to the council, told them, that there was no occasion for any farther witnesses, because what the prisoner had said was palpable blasphemy, and so demanded their opinion, who unanimously agreed, that, according to their law, he was guilty of death.

With this resolution they repaired to their respective homes, for now it was late, and left our Lord to the mercy of the soldiers, and the high-priest’s servants, who offered all the acts of insolence and effrontery that they could invent, to his sacred person, whilst some spit on him, others buffeted him, others blindfolded him, and others again, smiting him with their fists, called on him to prophecy ^g who it was that struck him, with many more indignities, and abominable blasphemies, which must have been greater than all patience, had his meekness and patience been less than infinite.

During this melancholy scene, Peter, whose fears had made him flee from his master in the garden, having a little recovered his spirits, and hoping to pass undiscovered in the throng, ventured in among others, to see the issue of this fatal night, and by the interest of his fellow-disciple, John, who went with him, was let in by a maid-servant to the high-priest’s palace. ^h It was now cold weather ; and the servants and officers having kindled a fire in the common hall, Peter went in, and sat down among them to warm himself ; when the maid who let him in, fixing her eyes upon him, was confident she knew him, and accordingly, told the company that he was a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, which he positively council met at the house of Caiaphas, was ready for him.—Calmet’s Dictionary, and Whitby’s Annotations.

¹ John xviii. 23.

² John ii. 19.

^a It is probable, that Caiaphas questioned Jesus concerning the number and rank of his disciples ; but to this he answered nothing. He also enquired of him, what doctrine he had taught the people, with reference either to his assuming the character of the Messiah, or to the contrariety of his doctrine to the traditions of the elders. To this Jesus replied, that he had taught the people in the most frequented places, and the most open manner, and had spoken nothing in private different from his public instructions. It was not therefore proper to require his testimony in his own cause, as they were not disposed to believe it ; but that regard to due order, or to law and justice, required them to seek for witnesses among those who had heard him. It is most likely, that some were then present, who had frequently heard his instructions. This reply was peculiarly suitable to the situation, in which Jesus was at this time placed ; for he stood as a prisoner in his trial, before judges who were determined to put him to death, and only sought a pretence for their injustice and murder.—Scott’s Commentary.—Ed.

^b This was an outrage to all justice : for a prisoner, before he is condemned, is ever considered to be under the especial protection of justice ; nor has any one a right to touch him, but according to the direction of the law. But it has been observed before that, if justice had been done to Christ, he could neither have suffered nor died.—Dr A. Clarke on John xviii. 22.—Ed.

^c From this defence which our Saviour makes for himself, we may learn, that we are not literally to understand his precept of turning the other cheek to him that smites us, since instead of doing this, we find him endeavouring to vindicate the innocence of his words ; and from hence we may observe likewise, that to stand upon the defence of our own innocence, cannot be contrary to the Christian duties of patience and forgiveness.—Whitby’s Annotations.

^d The Jews in general, but especially their judges and magistrates, had a custom of conjuring by the name of God, or of exacting an oath of those whose crimes did not sufficiently appear by the evidence of witnesses, or any other means. The person thus interrogated was obliged to speak truth, and, in all doubtful cases, his confession or denial was decisive, either to acquit or condemn him.—Calmet’s Commentary.

^e The rending the clothes was a token of indignation, holy zeal, and piety, among the Jews, expressed on several occasions, especially of grief in humiliation : and of anger, in hearing any blasphemous speech. This however was forbidden the high-priest, not only as to his sacerdotal vestments, but also as to his other garments, (Lev. xxi. 10.) because he was not to appear before God in the habit of a mourner ; but they, by their traditions, had so qualified that precept, as to allow him to rend his clothes at the bottom, though he was not permitted to do it from the top to the breast.—Beausobre’s and Whitby’s Annotations.

^f From hence we may observe, that the Jews of that age did not think, that the Messiah was to be God, but only a man, who could not challenge to himself divinity ; seeing they never concluded our Lord to be a blasphemer, because he said he was the Christ, but only because he said he was the Son of God, and thereby made himself equal with God, (John v. 18.)—Whitby’s Annotations.

^g By this kind of insult, they tacitly reproached him with being a false prophet.—Calmet’s Commentary.

^h The Jews themselves allow, as Dr Lightfoot informs us, that there might be frost and snow at the time of the passover ; and a common thing it was for great dews to fall then, which would make the air cold, until the sun had exhaled them.—Whitby’s Annotations.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

denied to them all, and, as he withdrew into the porch, heard the cock crow, ^a but his troubled thoughts took no notice of it.

While he was in the porch, another maid charged him with the same thing; but he denied it again, not only with the same confidence, but with the solemnity of an oath; and, about an hour after, when another inferred from his dialect, ^b that he must necessarily be a Galilean, and a relation of the man whose ear he had cut off strongly affirmed that he saw him in the garden, this so intimidated him, that, with horrid oaths ^c and imprecations upon himself, he denied the matter, till the cock crew the second time, and our Saviour, who was then in the hall, turning to Peter, gave him such a glance, as reminded him of his prediction, and the foulness of his own crime; whereupon, being stung with compunction, and sadly oppressed with shame and grief, he went out, and wept; he wept abundantly, he wept bitterly.

Early next morning the sanhedrim ^d met again in a full body at their room in the temple, whither they ordered Jesus to be brought; and, having again inquired of him, whether he was the true Messiah, and the Son of God? and again received the same answer from him, they adjudged him guilty of blasphemy; and accordingly, having condemned him, carried him to the palace ^e

^a It is reported of St Peter, that, ever after, when he heard the cock crow, he wept, remembering the old instrument of his repentance and conversion and his own unworthiness, for which he never ceased to do acts of sorrow and penance.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^b The Galileans spake the same language that the rest of the Jews did; but then they had a certain uncouth accent and manner of expression, which distinguished them from others, and made them to be contemned, and ridiculed by the natives of Judea.—Calmel's Commentary, and Beausobre's Annotations.

^c Some of the ancients have taken great pains to extenuate this fault of Peter's. St Ambrose on Luke, and Hillary on Matthew, both assert, that the apostle did not lie in saying; 'I know not the man,' but only disguised the truth, renouncing Christ in the quality of a man, but not as the Son of God. But this according to St Jerome, is to defend the servant by accusing the master of a lie; for if St Peter did not actually deny him, our Lord must have falsely affirmed, 'Thou shalt deny me thrice.' The opinion of those therefore is rather to be embraced, who acknowledge that St Peter, by denying Christ with his mouth committed a mortal sin, and fell from grace; and, as it is certain, that, confirming this denial with an oath, and added horrid execrations to it, his sin was highly aggravated; instead of accounting as some do, his denial a sin of infirmity, wherein his heart was true, though his mouth false, we can hardly think, that he could do all this without great checks of his conscience, and that, consequently, for the present he was in a state of defection, though his bitter weeping, and quick repentance, after that Christ had looked upon him, might make an atonement for his transgression.—Calmel's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^d The assembly, which was held the night before, and wherein our Saviour was declared worthy of death, was neither general nor judicial, according to the sense of the law, which did not allow justice to be administered in private, or in the night time: and therefore the high priests and rulers met again in the morning in the council chamber in the temple, which they could not do the night before, because the temple was then always shut, there to re-examine our Saviour, and condemn him in form.—Calmel's Commentary.

^e At Jerusalem the people show you, at this time, the palace of Pilate, or rather the place where they said it stood; for now an ordinary Turkish house possesses its room. In this pretended house, which stands not far from St Stephen's gate, and borders on the area of the temple, on the north side, they show you of the Roman governor, whose name at that time was Pontius Pilate, ^f desiring of him to ratify their sentence, and demanding a warrant ^g for his execution.

Judas in the mean time watching the issue of these proceedings, and finding that his master was delivered to the secular power, repented of his perfidy, and, taking the money which was the reward of his treason, went to the council ^h and threw it among them, declaring openly that he had acted very wickedly in betraying the innocent blood. But as people that employ such instruments have no regard to what becomes of them, all the comfort that he had from them was, that since it was his own act and deed, ⁱ it was his business to look to a room, in which Christ was mocked with the ensigns of royalty, and bulletted by the soldiers; and, on the other side of the street, which was anciently another part of the palace, is the room, where they say our Lord was scourged.—Well's Geography of the New Testament, part i.

^f It is not well known of what family or country this governor was, though it is generally believed that he was of Rome, at least of Italy. He succeeded Gratus to the government of Judea, in which he continued fourteen years, that is, from the twelfth to the twenty second of Tiberius, and is represented by Philo, (De Legatione ad Caium) as a man of an impetuous and obstinate temper, and a judge who used to sell justice, and for money pronounce any sentence that was desired. The same author makes mention of his rapines, his injuries, his murders, the torments he inflicted upon the innocent, and the persons he put to death without any form of process. In short, he describes him as a man that exercised an excessive cruelty during the whole time of his government, from which he was deposed by Vitellius, the proconsul of Syria, and sent to Rome, to give an account of his conduct to the emperor. But though Tiberius died before Pilate arrived at Rome, yet his successor Caligula banished him to Vienna in Gaul, where he was reduced to such extremity, that he killed himself with his own hands. The evangelists call him the governor, though, properly speaking, he was no more than the procurator of Judea, not only because governor was a name of general use, but because Pilate, in effect, acted as one, by taking upon him to judge in criminal matters, as his predecessors had done, and other procurators, in the small provinces of the empire where there was no proconsul, constantly did.—Calmel's Dictionary, under the word Pilate.—Eachard's Ecclesiastical History, b. ii. c. 2. and Beausobre's Annotations.

^g Not that the Romans had, at this time, taken from the sanhedrim the power of life and death; for, about a year after this, we find the proto-martyr Stephen regularly tried, condemned, and stoned by their sole authority; but therefore the Jewish rulers desired the concurrence of the Roman governor, that they might make our Saviour undergo a more severe and ignominious punishment than they could have inflicted upon him by their own power, because crucifixion was a death that their law had not prescribed. To this purpose we may observe, that to induce the governor to comply with their demand, the accusation which they brought against him was of a civil nature, and such as would consign him to the punishment they desired: 'we found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar,' Luke xxiii. 2.—Universal History, b. ii. c. 11.

^h Such is the purchase of treason and the reward of covetousness. It is cheap in its offers, momentary in the possession, unsatisfying in its fruition, uncertain in its stay, sudden in its departure, horrid in the remembrance, and a ruin, a certain and miserable ruin, in the event.—Taylor's Life of Christ, s. iii.

ⁱ The answer of the chief priests to Judas, when he brought back to them the thirty pieces of silver, and declared that he had betrayed the innocent blood, was a perfectly natural one for men of their character: 'What is that to us? see thou to that.' Men who had any feeling, any sentiments of common humanity, or even of common justice, when so convincing a proof of the accused person's innocence had been given them, would naturally have relented, would have put an immediate stop to the proceedings, and released the prisoner. But this was very far from entering into their plan. With the guilt or innocence of it, not theirs; so that being tortured with the agonies of guilt, and finding no relief any where, he went and hanged himself; ^a but in his death there was something so particular, that it made all the inhabitants of Jerusalem take notice of it. The money, however, which he threw among the council, the priests thought not proper to put in the treasury, because it was the price of blood, ^b and therefore they purchased with it a spot of ground, ^c

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

Jesus they did not concern themselves. This was not their affair. All they wanted was the destruction of a man whom they hated and feared, and whose life and doctrine were a standing reproach to them. This was their object: and as to the mercy or the justice of the case, on this head they were at perfect ease; 'What is that to us? See thou to that.' And yet to see the astonishing inconsistency of human nature, and the strange contrivances by which even the most abandoned of men endeavour to satisfy their minds and quiet their apprehensions; these very men, who had no scruple at all in murdering an innocent person, yet had wonderful qualms of conscience about putting into the treasury the money which they themselves had given as the 'price of blood!'—Porteus's Lectures on Mat.—Ed.

^a There are some difficulties concerning the manner in which Judas died. Matthew says, simply, that he hanged himself; whereas Luke (Acts i. 18.) says further, that 'falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out.' This apparent discrepancy has occasioned much controversy, and various solutions have been offered. Mr Hewlett we think has hit upon the true one. He considers the narrative of Luke to be supplemental to that of Matthew's, and to state an additional fact. Matthew having related that Judas departed, and went and hanged himself, Luke had not the least doubt respecting the fact, but knew that all suicides, who hang themselves, are cut down sooner or later by those who find them. It is at this point that Mr Hewlett supposes the short supplementary narrative in the Acts to begin. The rope being cut or untied (πεννυς γυνομενος), 'falling headlong,' or rather 'falling on his face, he burst asunder,' &c. It was perfectly natural for Luke on this occasion, if not as an evangelist, yet as a physician, to relate by way of parenthesis, the pathological fact here recorded; which is so far from being incredible, that it is very natural, and not unlikely to happen. A skilful physician informed Mr Hewlett, that in cases of violent and painful death there is usually an effusion of lymph, or lymph mixed with blood, into the cavities of the chest and abdomen. If the body be kept till putrescence takes place, a gas is evolved from the fluid in such quantity as to distend enormously, and sometimes to rupture the peritoneum and abdominal muscles: this effect has been observed in bodies hung on gibbets in England; and it would take place much more readily in warmer climates.—Calmet's Dictionary.—Ed.

^b It was a custom among the Jews, which was afterwards imitated by the first Christians, that it should not be lawful for executioners to offer any thing, or for any alms to be received from them; and so, by analogy, any money with which a life was bought was not to be put into the treasury.—Hammond's Annotations.

^c The valley of Jehoshaphat runs cross the mouth of another valley, called the valley of Hinnom, lying at the bottom of mount Sion. On the west side of this valley is the place called the Potter's field, where, not improbably, the people of that trade were used to dry their pots before they baked them. It was afterwards called the Field of Blood, for the reason that the evangelist assigns; but at present, from that veneration which it has obtained amongst Christians, it is named Campo Sancto, or the Holy Field. It is a small plat of ground, not above thirty yards long, and about half as much broad; and one moiety of it is taken up by a square fabric about twelve yards high, built for a charnel-house, and covered over with a vault, in which are some openings, to let down the bodies that are to be buried there. The earth must certainly be impregnated with a very corrosive salt, if what some tell us be true, namely, that it can dissolve a body in the space of four and twenty hours. Those, however, who have looked down through these openings, tell us, that they could see many bodies under several degrees of decay, from whence they conjectured, that this grave does not make such quick dispatch with the corpses committed to it as is commonly reported. The Armenians have the command of this burying-place, for which they pay to the Turks the rent of a zequin a-day: and a little below the Campo Sancto is shown an intricate cave, or a sepulchre, consisting of several rooms, one within another, in which the apostles are said to have hid themselves when they forsook their master and fled.—Hell's Geog. of the New Test., part i.

then called the Potter's field, but afterwards ¹ the field of blood, for a place of interment for strangers. ^d
When the members of the sanhedrim came to the governor's palace, they refused to go into the ² judgment hall ^e for fear of contracting some pollution, and therefore Pilate went out to them; and as he understood that they had already passed sentence upon him, he demanded the grounds of their accusation against him. But being unwilling that any inquiry should be made into the particulars of their proceedings, they answered in general, that ^f 'if he were not a criminal, they would not have brought him to him.' Imagining, therefore, that the prosecution was about some matters relating to their religion, the governor desired they would take him, and judge him according to their own law: but to this they replied, ^g 'that it was not permitted them to put any man to death.'

¹ Acts i. 19.

² John xviii. 28.

monly reported. The Armenians have the command of this burying-place, for which they pay to the Turks the rent of a zequin a-day: and a little below the Campo Sancto is shown an intricate cave, or a sepulchre, consisting of several rooms, one within another, in which the apostles are said to have hid themselves when they forsook their master and fled.—Hell's Geog. of the New Test., part i.

^d The strangers here meant may be either men of other nations, with whom the Jews would have no commerce, even when they were dead, and therefore provided a separate burying-place for them: or they might be Jews, who coming from far to Jerusalem to sacrifice, died there before their return home, and so the priests provided a burying place for them.—Hammond's Annotations.

^e Because in the governor's palace there was a guard of Roman soldiers, and a great company of servants, and as they were heathens, they thought that by touching any of them they should be defiled, and consequently made incapable of eating the Passover, of which no unclean person was to partake. By the Passover, however, here in St John, (chap. xviii. 28.) we are not to understand the Paschal lamb, which the rest of the Jews, as well as our Saviour, had eaten the night before, but the Chagigah, or peace offering, that is, the sheep and oxen that were offered all the seven days of the feast, and are expressly called the Passover, (Luke xxii. 1.) Thus the Jewish doctors remark upon Deut. xvi. 2. 'Thou shalt sacrifice the Passover to the Lord, of the flock, and of the herd,' that the flock signifies the lambs, which were eaten on the 14th, and the herd, the offerings of the Chagigah, which were consumed on the 15th day of the month Nisan. The Jewish rulers therefore would not go into the judgment hall, that they might not be unfit to eat the Passover, that is, those paschal-offerings of the herd, which were holy things, and of which none might eat in their defilement.—Whitby's Annotations, and Appendix to St Mark.—(See Calmet's Commentary upon this passage of St John, where he opposes this opinion with reasons that seem to have some weight in them.)

^f By this answer they seem willing to make Pilate not so much a judge of the cause, as an executor of their sentence. But there cannot possibly be a higher act of injustice, than to desire that a judge should suppose the accused person guilty of the crime, without any farther examination. It is no strange and extraordinary thing to see innocent persons oppressed by arbitrary proceedings, without any legal process; but for a man to be brought before a judge, in order to be delivered up directly to execution, without one proof of his crime, or any examination concerning it, is a new way of oppression, first invented and contrived against the Saviour of the world.—Calmet's Commentary.

^g Whether the Jews had at this time the power of life and death is a point much controverted among the learned. The answer which the Jewish rulers here give to Pilate, and the general opinion of their Rabbins, who suppose that their rulers lost that power about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, seem to incline to the negative. But those who take

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31, FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

By these reserved answers, Pilate perceiving that their intention was to make him the instrument of their malice against an innocent man, refused to intermeddle in the affair, unless they would exhibit some articles of accusation against him. Knowing therefore that Pilate was a creature of the Roman court, and a slave to its greatness, they alleged against our Lord, that, ^a he was guilty of seditious practices, of dissuading the payment of the tribute to Cæsar, and of setting himself up for a king. Pilate, hearing the name of a king, thought himself concerned to examine that point; and therefore, returning to the judgment-hall, and seating himself upon the tribunal, he asked Jesus, whether he was the king of the Jews? Which our Lord never pretended to deny; but then he informed the governor, that 'his kingdom was not of this world,'^b and could therefore give no umbrage to the Romans; for that, had it been a worldly kingdom, his subjects and followers would have certainly fought for him, and saved him from the hands of the Jews. When Pilate heard that he disclaimed all right to secular kingdoms, he thought he had nothing to do to examine him about the nature of his spiritual empire; and therefore, withdrawing from the court into the Vestibulum, where his accusers were impatiently expecting the ratification of their sentence, in order to execution, contrary to their hopes, he plainly told them, that he found nothing worthy of death in him.

Upon this disappointment, the chief priests, and elders, grew exceeding fierce and clamorous, representing our Lord as a turbulent mover of the people, and charging him with the spreading of seditious principles through all ^c Galilee and Judea, even as far as Jerusalem. Pilate hearing them name Galilee, and understanding that he was a Galilean, and consequently, belonged to ^d Herod's jurisdiction; in order to get rid of the importunity of the Jews, and withal to free himself from this odious and puzzling affair, sent him immediately to Herod, who was then at Jerusalem, upon the occasion of the feast. Herod was no less proud of the honour done him by Pilate, than glad of having this opportunity to gratify his curiosity. ^e the other side of the question argue thus: that the Jews, when reduced to a Roman province, had still the privilege granted them, to use the sacred institutions and customs that were derived to them from their fathers, (Joseph Antiq. b. xiv. c. 17.) that it was granted to Hyrcanus the high-priest, if any controversy should arise concerning their discipline that the judgment of it should be referred to him; that, pursuant to this grant, we find the high-priest and his council stoning Stephen, not by the rage of zealots, as some conceive, but according to the law, which requires, that the blasphemer should be stoned, (Levit. xxiv. 16.) that Saul, armed with the power of the high-priest and elders, persecuted the Jewish Christians unto death, and led them bound to Jerusalem to be punished, (Acts xxii. 4. 5.) that the Jews would have judged Paul after their own law, (Acts xxiv. 6.) and have put him to death, (Acts xxiii. 27.) had not Lysias, the chief captain, rescued him from their hands, which, they say, he did by violence, that is, by an invasion of their rights, but he affirms he did it because he understood that Paul was a Roman: and from hence they conclude, that they still retained the power of judging, and condemning these to death, who were Jews by nature and descent, and by their laws deserved to die, though as to some persons, and in some cases, they had not that power. Thus, when Annas, or Ananus, the high-priest, killed James, the brother of our Lord, and stoned many other Christians, as transgressors of the law, the wisest part of the nation, says Josephus, disliked his proceedings, because he should not have called a council concerning life and death, without licence from Albinus, the Roman president. From whence we may infer, that the power of inflicting capital punishments, even upon the Jews converted to the Christian faith, was then so far taken from them, that they could not regularly do it, without first obtaining leave from the Roman governor: and in the case of our blessed Saviour, the Jews had debarred themselves from the power of putting him to death, after they had accused him before Pilate, not of crimes committed against their law, but of sedition, and aspiring at a kingdom, to the prejudice of Cæsar and the Roman government, whereof it belonged to Pilate, and not to them, to judge and determine. And therefore their saying to him, 'it is not lawful for us to put any man to death,' (John xviii. 31.) is looked upon, either as a kind of complaint of the encroachments which the Romans had made upon their civil constitution, or as a mere pretence, since Pilate gave them enough, when he bade them to take him, and judge him according to their law; and that the true reasons of their bringing him before the Roman tribunal, were, that he might be condemned for sedition, which would be a means to secure them from the rage of the people, and that he might be crucified, which was a Roman death, and generally inflicted on those that were found tampering against the government.—Calmel's Commentary, and Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^a When our Lord's accusers came before Pilate, they said nothing of his pretended blasphemy, his destruction of the temple or violation of the law of Moses, because they were questions that the governor, they knew, would not concern himself with; and therefore they forged such accusations against him as they thought might make him odious and suspected to the Roman government, and oblige Pilate to be severe against him.

—Calmel's Commentary.

^b Jesus then intimated, that he was a king; but that 'his kingdom was not of this world,' it had nothing to do with men's temporal interests or privileges; it left rulers and subjects in the same situation as it found them; and it was therefore no object of jealousy to any government. Had he claimed a kingdom of an earthly nature, he would of course have armed his followers, and they would have fought in his cause, but as his disciples had been few in number, inoffensive in their habits, and forbidden to fight for him, even when he was apprehended, it was evident that his kingdom was not of a secular nature, but related wholly to spiritual and heavenly things, and would be supported entirely by spiritual sanctions and authority, John xviii. 33. 36.—Scott's Commentary.

^c Here they artfully make mention of Galilee, to incite Pilate against him as a seditious person, and to confirm their own suggestion that he was so; for they give him to think, that, as he was a Galilean, he might probably embrace the opinion of Judas Gaulonites, who held it was not lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar: a notion which the inhabitants of Galilee had generally imbibed, and, upon that account, were always prone to sedition and rebellion, for which some of them, not long before, had been set upon and slain by Pilate. — Whitby's Annotations.

^d Pilate's government did not extend to Galilee; it included Judea only. Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great, was, at this time, king or tetrach of Galilee; Jesus, consequently, was his subject; and therefore, according to the Roman laws, it was Pilate's duty to send him to his proper sovereign, especially as he was accused of rebellion, and a design to make himself a king.—Calmel's Commentary, and Grotius on Luke xxiii.

^e Herod was greatly rejoiced to see Jesus, perhaps desiring to satisfy himself whether he were indeed 'John the baptist risen from the dead' as he once supposed (notes xiii. 31—33. Mat. xiv. 1, 2.) He had, however, long wished to see him, having heard many reports concerning his doctrine and miracles, in hopes of having his curiosity gratified, by beholding some effects of his power in working miracles. But our Lord saw good not only to disappoint that expectation, but also to keep a profound silence in his presence, not returning any answer to his multiplied questions, or to the vehement accusations of his enemies. Yet Herod, though doubtless vexed and mortified, did not choose to have any hand in putting him to death, having probably been greatly terrified in his conscience, on account of his murder of John the baptist. He therefore contented himself with treating Jesus as a despicable person, beneath his notice; except that he joined with his officers and guards in deriding and insulting him. In token of their contempt of his pretensions

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

For, having heard much of our Saviour's fame, he expected to see some miracle or other done by him; but found himself sadly disappointed. For though the scribes and rulers pursued him with their accusations to Herod's palace, and Herod, in hearing the cause, asked him several questions, yet he would not vouchsafe so much as one answer; which made the tetrarch look upon him as an insignificant, despicable person; and, accordingly, having committed him to the derision and insults of his guards, who used him with the utmost indignity, he sent him back again to Pilate, arrayed in a white robe, ^a whether it was to make a mock of him, or to indicate his innocence, or both; but so it was, that, from that time, Herod and Pilate, ^b who before were at great variance, were, upon this occasion, perfectly reconciled.

When our Lord was remanded back in this manner, Pilate addressed himself to the priests and rulers of the people, telling them, 'That though they had brought this man before him as a seditious person, and a seducer of the people, yet, upon examination, he could not find him guilty of any of the crimes that were laid to his charge; that this was not his own opinion only, but that Herod who was a more competent judge of the affair, and to whom he had sent him, on purpose to take cognisance of it, had no wise signified that his crimes were capital; and therefore, instead of taking away his life, he proposed some lesser punishment, if they thought fit, such as ^b scourging him a little with whips, and so dismissing him.' But this lenity was so disagreeable to their enraged temper, that they peremptorily demanded execution, saying, 'Crucify him, crucify him.' Pilate, still tender of shedding innocent blood, expostulated the matter with them, desiring to know what evil he had done; for, as for his part, he could find no fault in him, much less any crimes deserving of death; but this did but the more exasperate, and make them more clamorous for a speedy execution.

to be a king, they clothed him with some splendid garment, which had perhaps been worn by Herod; and he was sent back thus attired to Pilate, that he might dispose of him as he pleased. Probably, the Roman soldiers took the hint, from this insult of Herod and his guard, to clothe Jesus with a purple robe, and to put on him a crown of thorns.—Scott's Commentary, on Luke xxiii. 6, 12—Ed.

^b A white or shining robe, for this is the meaning of the original. The Roman princes wore purple robes, and Pilate therefore put such a robe on Jesus. The Jewish kings wore a white robe, which was often rendered very shining or gorgeous by much tinsel or silver interwoven. Josephus says that the robe which Agrippa wore was so bright with silver, that when the sun shone on it, it so dazzled the eyes that it was difficult to look on it. The Jews and Romans, therefore, decked him in the manner appropriate to their own country, for purposes of mockery. All this was unlawful and malicious, as there was not the least evidence of his guilt.—Barnes on the Gospels, vol. ii.—Ed.

^c It is generally thought, that the cause of this difference between them was the massacre that Pilate made of some Galileans at Jerusalem, in the time of the Passover, (Luke xiii. 1.) which Herod resented as an indignity put upon him, and an invasion of his authority, who was at that time tetrarch of Galilee.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^d This chastisement, as Pilate calls it, was not in order to his crucifixion, and therefore was not that punishment which the Romans used to inflict upon malefactors, as a preparative to their execution; for Pilate intended it as a means to procure his release; and therefore he seemed willing to consent to it as a punishment, which the Jews so commonly inflicted upon those

The governor had one expedient more, which he thought would not fail him. Every passover ^e he was obliged, by a certain custom, to pardon one criminal whom the Jews should nominate; and therefore when the people came, and were urgent with him to grant them that usual favour, he proposed two persons to them; Barabbas, a notorious malefactor, who, in an insurrection with some other seditious persons, had committed murder; and Jesus, who was called 'Christ;' never doubting but that the populace, who he knew were better inclined to our Lord than their rulers, would have preferred an innocent man before a thief and a murderer. But, at the instigation of their priests, and others in authority, they required that the favour might be granted to Barabbas. Hereupon, when the governor desired to know what he was to do with the person whom they called Christ, they, one and all, cried out, 'Crucify him, crucify him;' and as he still insisted on his innocence, and proposed some lighter punishment, which was all, to be sure, that he could deserve, they began to redouble their clamours, and, in the most tumultuous manner imaginable, demand that he might be crucified.

The governor, in the mean time, received a message from his wife, ^f desiring him by no means to condemn the innocent person that was then before him, because, upon his account, she had had that night many frightful and uneasy dreams; which made him the more earnest to release him, or at least to spare his life; and therefore, in hopes of pacifying the people's rage, he ordered him to be scourged. The soldiers who were to do this, thinking it not enough to execute his orders, took him into the common hall, where, having stripped him of his own clothes, they put a loose purple coat about him as a robe, ^g a wreath of thorns upon his head for a crown, and who had acted perversely against their laws and their traditions, that he might exempt him from that sentence, which they were so urgent with him to pronounce. But the result of this his compliance was, that he neither saved our Lord, nor preserved justice. Instead of one punishment, the innocent was made to suffer two, being at last both scourged and crucified.—Whitby's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^e As the feast of the Passover was celebrated by the Jews in memory of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, it was very agreeable to the nature of that feast, and therefore customary at that time, though practised on no other festivals, to make this release. It is observed, however, that this practice was no custom of the Jews, even when they had the civil administration in their hands, but a piece of popularity, or favour of the procurator, first brought in by Pilate, and afterwards continued by some christian emperors, who, by a general law, commanded the judges, that, on the first day of the Passover, all Jewish prisoners, except such as were committed for particular crimes, should be discharged.—Whitby's and Hammou's Annotations.

^f From the time of Tiberius, the governors of provinces were allowed to take their wives along with them, which was a privilege not granted them before. This wife of Pilate's according to the general tradition, was named Claudia Procula; and, in relation to her dream, some are of opinion, that as she had intelligence of our Lord's apprehension, and knew, by his character, that he was a righteous person, her imagination, being struck with these ideas, did naturally produce the dream we read of. But, as our Saviour was apprehended about midnight, out of the city, and without Pilate's privity, and detained in the house of Annas, until it was day, there was no possibility for her having any notice of it before she went to sleep; and therefore we have the juster reason to believe, that this dream was sent providentially upon her, for the clearer manifestation of our Lord's innocence.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^g It is said, and they put on him a 'scarlet robe.' Mark a reed in his hand for a sceptre; and then, in derision, saluted him, and bowing their knees, mocked him with the sham profession of allegiance. After this they spit in his face, smote him on the cheek, and to make his crown of thorns pierce the deeper, struck him on the head with his phantastic sceptre; and then leading him to a pillar, where they tied him fast, they scourged him with whips, and with such unrelenting cruelty, that his tender flesh was torn in pieces, and the pavement crimsoned with his most precious blood.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33. OR, A. M. 5412. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

In this piteous plight, with his head, face, and body imbrued in blood, and with all his mock ornaments on, Pilate, in hopes of moving the people's compassion, ordered him to be brought forth; and when he appeared, 'See the man!' says he, 'this rueful spectacle of suffering innocence!' But so far were they from melting at the sight of so deplorable an object, that they raised their cries still louder and louder for his crucifixion; and when the governor still insisted on his innocence, ¹ 'We have a law,' ^a said they, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God.'

These last words raised some terror in Pilate, and gave him more uneasiness; for, taking them in such a sense as an Heathen might well put upon them, he began to apprehend, that if he should proceed to sentence against him, he might destroy not only an innocent person, but possibly some hero, or mighty demi-god, and so at once commit an act of injustice and impiety both. He therefore, returning with Jesus to the judgment-seat again, began to inquire into his original and pedigree. But as it was no part of our Saviour's intention to escape death, he thought it not proper to say any thing in his own justification; until his silence having given the governor some offence, inasmuch that he put him in mind, his life or death, his release or crucifixion, depended upon him, he then replied, that such power he could not have over him, 'were it not permitted him from above; and that therefore they who had delivered him up, had the greater sin ^b to answer for than he' says they clothed him in purple. The scarlet colour was obtained from a species of fruit, purple from shell-fish. The ancients gave the name purple to any colour that had a mixture of red in it, and consequently these different colours might be sometimes called by the same name. The robe here used was the kind worn by Roman generals, and other distinguished officers of the Roman army, and also by the Roman governors. It was made so as to be placed on the shoulders, and was bound around the body so as to leave the right arm at liberty. As we cannot suppose that Pilate would array him in a new and splendid robe, we must suppose that this was one which had been worn and cast off as useless, and now used to array the Son of God, as an object of ridicule and scorn!—Barnes on the Gospels, vol. i.—ED.

¹ John xix. 7.

a When the Jews perceived that Pilate looked upon the accusations which they brought against Jesus, of his being a seditious person, and one who aimed at a kingdom, as idle suggestions, and what had no shadow of probability in them, they had recourse to another allegation, namely his being a violator of the laws of their nation, and guilty of blasphemy, which, as they were allowed to be governed by their own law, they had a right to demand of their governor to see punished, and accordingly did it with arrogance enough.—Calmet's Commentary.

b Pilate indeed sinned heinously, in abusing his power to the condemnation of the innocent; but Judas sinned more, in delivering up to the chief priests, and the chief priests in delivering up to Pilate, than Pilate himself, whom they made a tool to

This reply made Pilate still the more desirous to release him; which when the Jews perceived, they found out at last this expedient to work upon his fears, by telling him plainly, 'that if he did not punish a man who set himself up for a king, he was an enemy to the emperor; a menace, which he, ^c who knew the jealous temper of his master Tiberius full well, and how easily a wrong representation of these proceedings might prove his ruin, had not the courage to withstand; and therefore, returning to the hall, he ordered Jesus to be brought in the same habit to his public tribunal, which stood in a paved place, called Gabatha, ^d and, before he gave sentence, calling for water, and washing his hands ^e before all the people, he solemnly declared, that he serve their malice and revenge. They had better means of knowledge than he, and so sinned against more light, and consequently their guilt was greater, and their condemnation heavier than his.—Beausobre's Annotations.

c Pilate repeatedly endeavoured to deliver our Saviour from the Jews, knowing that they accused him capitally, only from malice and envy. His wife also, who had been disturbed with dreams, sent and desired him not to participate in condemning that just person. In order to effect his purpose, he adopted several expedients, 1. He required legal accusation, evidence, and conviction; and, in default of these, he proposed to refer his condemnation to the Jews; who had not, as he well knew, the power of inflicting a capital punishment, (John xviii. 29, 31.) 2. He attempted to appease the Jews, and to give them some satisfaction, by whipping our Saviour. 3. He tried to take him out of their hands, by offering to deliver him, or Barabbas, on the festival day of the passover. 4. He wanted to discharge himself from pronouncing judgment against him, by sending him to Herod, king of Galilee. 5. When he saw all this would not satisfy the Jews, and that they even threatened him, saying he could be no friend to the emperor, if he let Jesus go, he caused water to be brought, washed his hands before all the people, and publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of that just person. Yet at the same time he delivered him up to the soldiers, that they might crucify him. This was enough to justify Christ, and to show that Pilate held him to be innocent; but it was not enough to vindicate the conscience and integrity of a judge, whose duty it was, as well to assert the cause of oppressed innocence, as to punish the guilty criminal.—Calmet's Dictionary.

d The word Gabatha in the Syriac, for that is the language which was then commonly spoken, and which the writers of the New Testament do therefore call the Hebrew, signifies an elevation; and therefore the place where Pilate had his tribunal erected, was probably a terrace, a gallery, or balcony, belonging to his palace, and paved with stone or marble, as the word λίθωστρωτος imports.

e Washing of hands, with a design to denote innocence, was not peculiar only to the Jews, but customary among other nations, because by the element of water it is natural to signify purity and cleanness; but then the question is, Whether in conformity to the Jews or Gentiles, it was that Pilate made use of this ceremony? To expiate an unknown murder, the elders of the next adjacent city were wont to wash their hands, and say, 'Our hands have not shed this blood,' (Deut. xxi. 6, 7.) And the Psalmist, having renounced all confederacy with wicked and mischievous men makes this resolution, 'I will wash my hands in testimony of my innocency,' (Psal. xxvi. 6.) From which passages Origen is of opinion, that Pilate did this in compliance with the manners of the Jews, that by actions, as well as words, he might declare to them the opinion he had of our Lord's innocence. But as Pilate was a Roman, others are rather inclined to think, that, in this action, he conformed himself to the manners of the Gentiles. The scholiast upon Sophocles (in Ajax) informs us that it was the custom among the ancients, when they had killed a man or shed blood, to wash their hands in water, whereby to purify them from their defilement; and to the same purpose Virgil introduces Æneas speaking: "It is wickedness for me, coming from so great carnage and bloodshed, to touch it till I have washed myself in the living stream." (Æneid, ii. ver. 118.) Nay, Clemens Romanus informs us, (b. ii. c. 52,) that when was 'innocent of the blood of that just man, and that they must answer for it;' whereupon the whole body of the people cried out, 'may his blood fall upon us and our posterity!' An imprecation as black as hell, and what has been too long (may it please the Almighty to shorten their punishment!) verified upon them. ^a

A. M. 4037 A D 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

Barabbas being thus released, and Jesus condemned to the cross, the soldiers and officers, after they had acted over again their former insults and indignities, took off the purple coat, and put his own garments on, and having laid an heavy cross upon his ^b shoulders, led him away ^c to his crucifixion: ^d but when they came to the gate of the city, his strength was so entirely exhausted, judges were going to pronounce sentence of death, they usually lifted up their hands to heaven, thereby to denote their own innocency; and it is not improbable that they washed their hands before they did so, that they might lift them up with the more purity.—Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^a This imprecation was most dreadfully fulfilled upon them at the siege of Jerusalem, when the vengeance of heaven overtook them with a fury unexampled in the history of the world; when they were exposed at once to the horrors of famine, of sedition, of assauiation, and of the swords of the Romans. And it is very remarkable that a strong correspondence may be traced between their sin and their punishment. 'They put Jesus to death when the nation was assembled to celebrate the passover, and when the nation assembled for the same purpose, Titus shut them up within the walls of Jerusalem. The rejection of the true Messiah was their crime: and the following of false Messiahs to their destruction was their punishment. They sold and bought Jesus as a slave: and they themselves were bought and sold as slaves at the lowest prices. They preferred a robber and murderer to Jesus, whom they crucified between two thieves: and they themselves were afterwards infested with bands of thieves and robbers. They put Jesus to death, lest the Romans should come and take away their place and nation: and the Romans did come and take away their place and nation. They crucified Jesus before the walls of Jerusalem: and before the walls of Jerusalem they themselves were crucified in such numbers, that it is said room was wanting for the crosses, and crosses for the bodies.'—Newton on the Prophecies, and Porteus's Lectures on Matt.—Ed.

^b It was a custom, that he who was to be crucified, should bear his own cross to the place of execution: but whereas it is generally supposed that our Lord bore the whole cross, that is, the long and transverse part both, this seems to be a thing impossible; and therefore Lipsius, in his treatise, (De supplicio crucis) has set the matter in a true light, when he tells us, that Jesus only carried the transverse beam, because the long piece of timber, or body of the cross, was either fixed in the ground before, or made ready to be set up, as soon as the prisoner came; and from hence he observes, that painters are very much mistaken in their description of our Saviour carrying the whole cross.

^c Capital punishments, both among the Jews and Romans, were inflicted without their cities. This was particularly observed in the crucifixion of malefactors.—Ed.

^d A death the most dreadful of all others, both for the shame and the pain of it. So scandalous, that it was inflicted, as the last mark of detestation, upon the vilest of people. It was the punishment of robbers and murderers, provided that they were slaves too; but otherwise if they were free, and had the privileges of the city of Rome, this was then thought a prostitution of that honour, and too infamous a punishment for such an one, let his crimes have been what they would. The form of a cross was that of two posts, cutting one another at right angles. On that which stood upright the body was fastened, by nailing the feet to it, and on the other transverse piece, by nailing the hands on each side. Now, because these parts of the body, being the instruments of action and motion, are provided by nature with a much greater quantity of nerves than others have occasion for, and because all sensation is performed by the spirits contained in these nerves, it will follow, that wherever they abound, the sense of pain must needs, in proportion, be more quick and tender. But though the that he was not able to stand under it any longer; and therefore they compelled one Simon, ^e a Cyrenian, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear it the rest of the way.

Among the vast throngs that followed to this execution, there were many people, especially some pious women, who could not behold this sad spectacle without the highest grief and lamentation; which when our Saviour observed, lifting up his face, all bloody and disfigured, 'Weep not for me,' said he, 'but weep for yourselves and your children; for it will not be long before those shall be accounted happy, who shall have no posterity ^f to inherit the miseries that shall then come upon this nation: for how dismal must their condition be, who shall call upon the ^g hills to cover them, and the pain of this kind of death was exceedingly sharp, yet as none of the vitals were immediately affected, the body continued thus stretched out, and hanging upon the nails that fastened it to the cross, until excess of anguish had by degrees quite exhausted the spirits, and driven out the soul; which must needs make the death which our Saviour submitted to for our sakes, slow and lingering, as well as painful and ignominious; so lingering, that St Andrew was two whole days upon the cross, and some other martyrs have been rather starved, and devoured by birds, than killed with the torments of the tree.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospel's, vol. ii., and Howell's Hist. in the notes.

^e Libya, in its proper acceptation, denotes those parts of the African continent which lie about the Mediterranean Sea, from Egypt eastward, to the Greater Syrtis, or Gulph of Sidra, westward. In the western part of this Libya stood Cyrene, a city of great note, and once of such power, as to contend with Carthage for some pre-eminences. But whether this Simon, whom the soldiers compelled to carry our Saviour's cross, was a Jew or Pagan, is a question that has been disputed among the ancients. Several fathers have thought that he was a Gentile, and that herein he was a type of that idolatrous people, who were afterwards to be called to the profession of the gospel and to carry the cross after Christ. But others, from his name, rather imagine that he was a Jew, and that, as there were great numbers of that nation in Egypt, and the neighbouring countries, this Simon might be one, whose habitation was at Cyrene in Libya, but was now coming up to Jerusalem, at the time of the Passover. He is called by St Mark, (chap. xv. 21.) the father of Alexander and Rufus, because these two persons were become famous in the Christian church, at the time when this evangelist wrote his gospel; but whether he himself was at this time a disciple of Christ, and afterwards bishop of Bostres in Arabia, where he suffered martyrdom, by being burnt alive by the Pagans, is much to be questioned, though some have asserted it, but not, I fear, from sufficient authority.—Well's Geography of the New Testament, part i., and Calmet's Commentary and Dictionary, under the word Simon.

^f This they undoubtedly had occasion to think at the siege of Jerusalem, and during the war against the Romans, not only on account of the loss of their children, and the sale of them who were under seventeen, for bond slaves, but chiefly on the account of that famine in Jerusalem which forced Mary the daughter of Eleazar, a woman of some figure and quality, to eat her own sucking child: 'Upon which,' says Josephus, 'the dread of famine made men weary of their lives, and the living envied the dead, that were taken away before the extremity came to this height.'—Jewish Wars, b. 7. c. 8.

^g That this is a proverbial expression, which the prophet (Hosea, x. 8.), makes use of to denote the utter despair of a people, when they see unavoidable calamities coming upon them, cannot be doubted; for so the Targum upon Hosea explains it, "He will bring such judgments upon them, as will render their condition as miserable as if the mountains should cover them, and the hills fall upon them." Isaiah speaks of the wicked that 'they should go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord,' (Isa. ii. 19.) And accordingly Josephus relates of the Jews, that after the taking of Jerusalem, many of them hid themselves in vaults and sepulchres, and there perished, rather than surrender to the Romans.—Ibid.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

mountains to fall on them, that by a sudden destruction they may escape the lingering calamities of famine and fear, and the horror of a thousand deaths!⁷

When he came to the place of execution, which was called Golgotha^a or Mount Calvary, the soldiers, before they nailed him to the cross, offered him a potion^b of wine mixed with gall, which, when he had tasted it, he refused to drink. They then stripped off his clothes, and having with four great nails fastened his hands and

^a Golgotha in the Syriac, vulgarly called the Hebrew tongue, signifies the same that Calvary does in Latin; and was so called, either because the form of the mount somewhat resembles a man's skull, or rather, because it being the common place of execution, a great number of dead men's skulls was usually to be seen there. The former conjecture, however, is the more probable, for reasons stated in another part of this work, (see description of Jerusalem.) This mount was a small eminence on the western side of the larger mount of Moriah, and is represented to have been 200 paces without the ancient walls of Jerusalem. The ancient summit of Calvary has been much altered, by reducing it level in some parts, and raising it in others, in order to bring it within the area of a large and irregular building, called the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which now occupies its site. But in doing this, care has been taken that none of the parts concerned in the crucifixion: should suffer any alteration. The same building also encloses within its spacious walls several other places reputed sacred: as 1, the place where Christ was derided by the soldiers; 2, where the soldiers divided his garments; 3, where he was shut up while the hole was dug to set the cross in, and the other necessary preparations were made for his crucifixion; 4, where he was crowned with thorns; 5, where he was nailed to the cross; 6, where the cross was erected, and the hole in which it was fixed; 7, where the soldiers stood who pierced his side; 8, the stone on which his body was anointed previous to his burial, commonly called the stone of unction, which stone is about eight feet in length and two in breadth; 9, where his body was deposited in the sepulchre; 10, where the angels appeared to the women after his resurrection; 11, where Christ himself appeared to Mary Magdalen; 12, where he appeared to the Virgin Mary. All these stations are distinguished by as many separate chapels or altars. This sacred place is now, alas! doubly profaned: for besides its being as is well known, in the possession of the followers of Mahomet, the most relentless enemies of Christ and his disciples, it is still further outraged by the idolatrous rites of the Greek and Latin churches. A kind of chapel has been made of the sepulchre, and on the very slab on which the body of our Lord was laid; and where an end was made of all sacrifice, the pretended sacrifice of the mass continues to be daily offered up. Nor is this all; for this place, sacred above every other to peace and truth, is made the scene of one of the most riotous and disgraceful festivals, as well as one of the most impudent frauds, which superstition ever gave birth to. Here, on Holy Thursday, it is pretended that the angel Gabriel brings fire from heaven; and the deluded multitude flock in crowds, with a dreadful tumult and uproar, to carry it away with them by means of candles, torches, &c.: the original fire being presented to them for that purpose by the priest, who pretends to receive it from the angel. It is a painful and humiliating reflection, that those very places which witnessed the overthrow of the empire of Satan, and from whence the pure light of the gospel should issue and spread over the whole earth, should be consigned to the practice of the most degrading superstitions. This, in the unsearchable wisdom of His purpose, is permitted by the Almighty for a time; but he is pledged to rescue his favourite country, as well as his favourite people, in 'the last days,' from darkness and oppression: and the Christian may entertain the pleasing hope, that the scene of the Saviour's sufferings will be made the seat of his visible glory.—Mansford's Gazetteer.

^b Interpreters and others vary very much about this passage, taking it two different ways, as St Matthew, (chap. xxvii. 31.) and St Mark, (chap. xv. 23.) seem to express it. Some will have it, that in St Matthew's sense, vinegar mingled with gall was a bitter, poisonous draught, to stupefy the person who drank it, that by benumbing his senses, he might feel less pain. Those that differ from this, say that, by the piety of some of the dis-feet, with his body stretched out, to the cross, they so raised it up, and fixed it in the ground. To stain his innocence, and to put him to the greater shame, they crucified him between two common malefactors. ^c But what might make an amends for that, was the inscription which Pilate ordered to be fixed on the top of his cross. JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS, in the three most general languages, ^d Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, then in vogue. This the high-priests would gladly have had him alter; but, either out of spite to them, who had forced him upon an unjust act, or out of honour to our Lord, whom he knew to be a righteous person, he positively refused to do it.

As soon as our Lord was fixed on the cross, which was much about noon, four soldiers, who were his executioners, went to the dividing the poor spoil of his garments. His mantle they cut into four parts, and took each of them one; but as for his coat, because it was one entire piece, ^e wove without seam, and would therefore principles, and, not improbably, of some of those good women who used to minister to Jesus, there was prepared wine mingled with myrrh, which according to Pliny, was an excellent and pleasant mixture, and such as the piety and indulgence of these nations used to administer to condemned persons, to fortify their drooping spirits against the terrors of approaching death. As the design of this mixture, however, was in some measure to intoxicate the sufferer, and to make him less sensible of his pain, our blessed Lord might therefore refuse to drink it, because it became him, who was then going to offer himself a free and voluntary sacrifice to God, for the sins of men, and was to show them a pattern how to bear afflictions, with due resignation to the divine will, to avoid a thing which might too far discompose his thoughts, and show too ill a precedent to his followers. To reconcile the difference then between the two evangelists, since the former affirms, that the potion offered to our Saviour was vinegar mingled with gall, the latter, wine mingled with myrrh, the easiest way is, to say, (with our learned Dr Lightfoot) that there were two cups offered to our Lord at the time of his passion; one of wine mixed with myrrh, by some of his friends, before he was nailed to the cross; and the other with vinegar, by the soldiers, in a scolding and insulting manner, after he was nailed to the cross; which is better than to assert, with some great names, that the ancient translator of St Matthew from the Hebrew or Syriac, mistaking the word marra, which properly signifies bitterness, might put gall, which in Syriac is marar, and derived from the same root, instead of myrrh.—Howell's History in the notes; Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^c The malefactors here mentioned were probably some of those factious and seditious gangs which Judea, at this time, was full of. Under pretence of public liberty, they committed all manner of violence and outrage; and stirring up the people against the Roman government, drew upon the nation all the calamity which afterwards befel it. As it was customary to crucify several malefactors at the same time, especially if convicted of the same crimes, our Saviour, who was accused by the Jews of seditious practices, had two, who were really guilty of that crime, executed with him, and him they placed in the midst, as in the most honourable place, purely in derision, and with the same malevolent spirit that made them array him in a purple robe, a sceptre, and a crown.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^d In Hebrew, or the Syriac, which was then the common language of the country; in Greek, which was the language of commerce almost all the east over; and Latin, because of the majesty of the Roman empire, which at that time, had extended its dominion over the then known world. The whole inscription however, is said to have been written after the Jewish manner, that is, from the right hand to the left, that it might be legible to the Jews, who, by conversing with the Romans, began now to understand a little Latin.—Calmet's Commentary and Howell's History in the notes.

^e Some of the fathers are of opinion, that this coat of our Saviour's was made of two pieces of woollen stuff, wove in a loom, and so fine drawn, that the joining could not be perceived.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 1—END.

be spoiled if it were divided, for it they cast lots, and therein fulfilled a famous prophecy.¹

While he thus hung upon the cross, in the most exquisite torments, several people of different denominations, the chief-priests, rulers and soldiers, most of the multitude, and almost every common passenger, insulted his misery; presuming, that a person, reduced to that low estate, could never be the promised Messiah. But all the reply that he made to their bitter and reviling speeches, was only by way of petition to his heavenly Father, that in respect of their ignorance, and confirmed prejudice against him, he would be pleased to overlook their barbarous treatment of him, and to pardon their provoking blasphemies.

Nay, of the two malefactors who were crucified with him, ^a one of them reviled, and mocked him in the same gross manner, requiring him to give the company, as they desired, a demonstration of his being the true Messiah, by rescuing both himself and them from the crosses whereon they were fixed. But the other malefactor ^b reproved his companion for insulting the innocent, and, while himself was receiving the just reward of his crimes, for upbraiding a person who suffered undeservedly; and

¹ Psal. xxii. 18.

Others will have it, that it was all needle-work, that is, knit, not wove from top to bottom. But Braunius, in his treatise on the dress of the Hebrew priests, has plainly proved, that the ancients had the art of weaving any habit, of what make or size soever, all of one piece, in a loom; that in several eastern countries, the art is still preserved and practised; and that himself made a machine, which Calmet in his Dictionary, under the word Vestments, has given us, wherein such a habit might be wrought. As it was customary formerly for women to weave stuffs and cloth, not for their own wearing only, but for their husbands' and children's use, (for so the character of the virtuous woman in Solomon, (Prov. xxxi. 13.) and the practice of Penelope, the wife of Ulysses, show,) it was the ancient tradition, that the blessed Virgin herself wove her son's coat: but that she made it for him when he was young; that it grew with him as he increased in stature, and continued always fresh without decay, is a mere fiction, in order to assimilate to the habits which the Israelites wore in the wilderness.—Calmet's Commentary and Dictionary.

^a If we compare Mat. xxvii. 44. where it is said, 'that the thieves, who were crucified with Jesus, cast the same in his teeth,' with what we find in Luke xxiii. 39. where it is said, 'one of the malefactors that was hanged railed on him,' we may be apt to fancy some contradiction in the evangelists; but this the commentators reconcile, by showing, that it is a very common thing in the Hebrew style, to use the plural number instead of the singular: As when it is said, that the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat, (Gen. viii. 4.) that is, on one of the mountains, and 'that God overthrew the cities where Lot dwelt,' (Gen. xix. 29.) when he could only dwell in one at a time; with several other examples both in the Old and New Testament. But I see no reason why we may not understand this passage, as St Chrysostom and St Jerom have done, namely, 'That both of the thieves did at first rail on Jesus, probably thinking by that artifice to obtain some help towards procuring their pardon; but being disappointed of their hopes, and hearing Jesus pray for his crucifiers, one of them was thereby prevailed upon, and converted:' especially since, according to this interpretation, the operations of God's grace upon this man's mind were more sudden and strong, and his conversion more miraculous.—Witby's and Hammond's Annotations; and Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. ii.

^b This thief is called by some authors Dimas or Dismus, and, out of the false gospel of Nicodemus, they produce many fables concerning him, but too absurd to be here related. Several of the fathers however give him the title of a martyr, because of the testimony which he bore to truth even when it seemed to be utterly deserted by every one else.—Calmet's Commentary.

then looking upon Jesus, with a noble reliance, and most wonderful faith, he humbly intreated him to retain some remembrance of him when he came into his kingdom. To which our Lord returned him this most gracious promise of speedy felicity, ^c 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.'

In the mean time there stood by our Saviour's cross, sad spectators of this dismal tragedy, the holy Virgin-mother, Mary the wife of Alpheus, ^d Mary Magdalene, and John his beloved apostle; to whose care and protection he recommended his sorrowful mother; ^e and from that

^c The word paradise comes from the Hebrew, or rather from the Chaldee pardes; and, according to the force of the original, it should properly signify an orchard, or plantation of fruit-trees, as in some passages of the Old Testament, particularly in Neh. ii. 8. it denotes a forest. The Septuagint make use of the word Παράδεισος, when they speak of the garden of Eden, which the Lord planted, in the beginning of the world, and therein placed our first parents. The Jews commonly call paradise the garden of Eden; and they imagine, that at the coming of the Messiah, they shall there enjoy an earthly felicity, in the midst of all sorts of delights; and, till the resurrection, and the coming of the Messiah, they think their souls shall abide here in a state of rest. In the books of the New Testament, the word paradise is put for a place of delight, where the souls of the blessed enjoy everlasting happiness; but where our Lord promises the penitent thief, that he 'should be with him in paradise,' it is thought by the generality of the fathers, that he means heaven itself; though modern commentators make no more of it, than that state of felicity which God has appointed for the reception of the pious, until the time of the general resurrection. Whether the place of departed souls is above, within, or beneath, the highest heavens; whether there is one common receptacle for the souls of the righteous and unrighteous till the resurrection; or whether, from their departure out of their bodies, they dwell in separate mansions, as is more probable, are speculations we are no ways concerned to be inquisitive about, whilst we are satisfied of this main truth, that the righteous are, in the intermediate time between their death and resurrection, in a state of happiness, and the wicked in a state of misery. For, as far as our apprehensions of these matters go, a material place can no ways contribute either to increase or to diminish the happiness or misery of an immaterial spirit. Spirits that are divested of flesh and blood, wherever they are, carry heaven or hell along with him. The good angels are as happy here upon earth, whilst they are employed in the execution of God's will, as whilst they are conversant in the regions above, because they do always behold the face of God, in whose presence is fulness of joy; and Satan was no more happy when he came among the sons of God to present himself before the Lord, (Job i. 6.) than he was when he was going to and fro in the earth. The happiness and misery of pure spirits have no relation, that we know of, to the place where they are; but the happiness and misery of embodied spirits, or of men, who are made up of souls and bodies, have a dependence upon the place of their abode; and therefore we are sure, that wherever separate souls are lodged till the resurrection, after the resurrection, righteous and wicked men shall have places allotted to them, suitable to their different states; the former shall be carried up to the highest heavens, and the latter shall be thrown down to the nethermost hell.—Calmet's Commentary, and Bishop Smebridge's Sermons.

^d It is not determined in the original whether she was the wife, or mother, or daughter, of Cleopas; but critics generally suppose she was his wife, and that he was also called Alpheus, and was the father, as this Mary was the mother, of James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas, who are therefore called our Lord's brethren or kinsmen. (Mat. viii. 55.) Grotius indeed thinks that Cleopas was her father, and Alpheus her husband. After all we cannot certainly determine it; but, like most other undeterminable points, it is a matter of no great importance. I know none who has set it in a plainer and juster light than Dr Edwards, Exercit. part ii. No. 1, p. 163. et seq.—Doddridge's Expositor.—Ed.

^e The generality of commentators do infer from hence, that time forward he took her to his house, and all along paid her the respect due to a parent.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5412. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15 END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN. xii. 19—END.

During these melancholy transactions, the whole frame of nature began to be changed: The sun withdrew its light; ^a the stars appeared; and the eclipse was the more remarkable, because the moon, being then at full, could not be in conjunction. This eclipse began about twelve, and lasted till three in the afternoon; when all things were full of horror and amazement. Men's hearts began to relent; and, instead of their former insults, they stood in silent expectance what would be the issue. All this while our blessed Lord continued meek and her husband Joseph was at this time dead; and therefore our Lord took care that she should not be destitute, by charging his beloved disciple to treat her as his mother. As Jesus now showed the tender concern he had for his mother, in committing her to the care of John, so this concern that he expressed for her support, must have affected her no less than if he had called her, Mother: which some have thought he might not choose to do, to avoid exposing her to the abuses of the populace, by a discovery of her near relation to him. But teoman was a title he before had used in speaking to his mother, where no such caution was necessary; and it was frequently applied in ancient times, even to persons that were the most respected. Neither her own danger, nor the sadness of the spectacle, nor the reproaches and insults of the people, could restrain her from performing the last office of duty and tenderness to her Divine Son on the cross. Grotius justly observes, that it was a noble instance of fortitude and zeal. Now a sword, according to Simeon's prophecy, Luke ii. 35, struck through her tender heart, and pierced her very soul; and perhaps the extremity of her sorrows might so overwhelm her spirits, as to render her incapable of attending the sepulchre, which we do not find that she did; nor do we indeed meet with any thing after this concerning her in the sacred story, or in early antiquity; except that she continued among the disciples after our Lord's ascension, which Luke observes, Acts i. 14. Andreas Cretensis, a writer of the seventh century, does indeed tell us, she died with John at Ephesus, many years after this, in an extreme old age, and it appears from a letter of the council of Ephesus in the fifth century, that it was then believed she was buried there. But they pretend to show her sepulchre at Jerusalem, and many ridiculous tales are forged concerning her death and assumption, or being taken up into heaven, of which the best Popish authors themselves appear heartily ashamed.—See Calmet's Dictionary, vol. ii. p. 114.—Doddridge's Expositor.—Ed.

^a Whether this darkness was confined to the land of Judea, or extended itself much farther, even over the whole hemisphere where it happened, is a question wherein the ancients are not so well agreed. Origen, and some others, are of the former opinion; but the majority differ from them, and for this they quote Phlegon, the famous astronomer under the emperor Trajan, affirming, that, in the fourth year of the CCLII Olympiad, which is supposed to be that of the death of Christ, there was such a total eclipse of the sun at noon day, that the stars were plainly to be seen; and from Suidas they likewise cite Dionysius the Areopagite, then at Heliopolis in Egypt, expressing himself to his friend Apollonius, upon this surprising phenomenon, 'Either that the author of nature suffered, or that he was sympathizing with some one that did?' For whereas in common eclipses the sun's total darkness can continue but twelve, or fifteen minutes at most, this is recorded to have lasted no less than three full hours, Matt. xxvii. 45.—Universal History, b. 2. c. 11. It is, however, at best very doubtful if the passage from Phlegon has any reference to this particular darkness; and as to the story told of Dionysius the Areopagite, it is entitled to still less attention, since Dr Lardner has proved that all the writings attributed to him are spurious. The probability is, that the darkness was confined to the land of Judea. And there was surely, (if we may venture to pronounce on the unscrutable purposes of almighty providence), a peculiar propriety in the darkness being so confined, as indicating the wrath of God on that country for the enormity then perpetrating; and presenting an apt emblem of the spiritual darkness in which that benighted region was involved.—Ed silent, though languishing and wasting under the agonies which his body endured, and the heavy load of the divine indignation against sin; till, in the words of the Psalmist, he complained at last, 'Eli! Eli! lama sabach-thani, that is, ^b My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'

One of the soldiers, hearing the word Eli, or Elihi, out of ignorance of the Hebrew tongue, thought, that he called for Elias to help him in his distress; and thereupon dipping a sponge in vinegar, ^c put it on a reed, which St John calls a stalk of hyssop, ^d and, as he complained of being thirsty, gave it to him to drink. Others however were for letting him alone, to see whether Elias ^e would come and help him. But when he had tasted the vinegar, and now knew, that all the types and prophecies

^b In the Hebrew way of speaking, it is certain, that God is said to leave or forsake, any person, when he suffers him to fall into great calamities, and lie under great misfortunes, and does not help him out of them. To this purpose Zion, having been long afflicted, is brought in by the prophet complaining, 'The Lord hath forsaken me, the Lord hath forgotten me,' Isa. xlix. 14. and as the royal Psalmist is very frequent in such complaints, so he explains the sense of them, when he addresses himself to God, 'Why art thou so far from my prayer,' so that, though 'I cry in the day-time, thou hearest not?' Psal. xxii. 1, 2. That David was not fallen into any despondency, is manifest from his calling God so fiducially his God; and that our blessed Saviour was not, as some think, under any failure of his trust in God, or any perturbation of spirit from the sense of divine wrath, is evident from his saying of his suffering condition, 'It is finished,' and from the very words wherein he breathed his last, 'Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit.' The truth is, this very thing shows the great composure of his mind; that while he was hanging upon the cross, he was so far master of himself, as to repeat the 22d Psalm, whereof the title or first words are, Eli, Eli, &c., a psalm which is allowed by all commentators to relate to the Messiah: which contains a most lively description of all the remarkable particulars of his passion, and for that reason, was a portion of Scripture which he thought proper to recite upon this mournful occasion. Upon the supposition, then, that our Lord was now repeating that noble psalm, which, after a recapitulation of his sufferings, concludes with very comfortable promises both to him and his followers; this shows, that he was far from being under any doubt or despair; that he kept his mind indeed all along calm and serene; and under the pressure of whatever he suffered, supported himself with the comfortable prospect of what was to follow.—Whitby's Annotations, and Universal History, b. 2. c. 11.

^c The vinegar and sponge, in execution of condemned persons, were set ready, to stop the too violent flux of blood, that the malefactor might be the longer in dying; but to the blessed Jesus they were exhibited in scorn; for being mingled with gall, the mixture was more horrid and unpleasant.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^d It may be pretended perhaps, that a branch of hyssop might not be long enough to reach our Saviour's mouth, as he was hanging upon the cross; but, besides that crosses were not in some places erected so high, but that beasts of prey could reach the bodies that were fastened to them; and that hyssop in those countries, as well as mustard seed, was of a much longer growth than it is with us; I cannot see, why the person that offered our Saviour this vinegar, might not make use of a ladder, if the cross was so high that he could not fairly reach him. Nor is the difference in St Matthew's calling that a reed, which St John calls hyssop, of any manner of moment; because the Greek word καλαμος, is put to signify a stalk, a shoot, or branch of any kind; so that St Matthew speaks of that in general, which St John specifies in particular.—Calmet's Commentary.

^e There was a tradition among the Jews, that it was Elias's proper office to come and succour such as were in misery; and, accordingly some of the Jews, either deceived by the resemblance of the words, thought that our Lord called Elias to his help; or giving a malicious turn to the sense of the words, which they well enough understood, did thereby insult him for his calling in vain Elias to his help.—Beausobre's Annotations.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR. A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

concerning him were fulfilled, his Father's wrath appeased, and the great work of man's redemption accomplished, he said, 'It is finished,' and then, 'bowing down his head,' recommended his soul into his Father's hands, and so gave up the ghost. ^a

Upon his expiration there immediately happened a terrible earthquake, ^b which rent the veil ^c of the temple from top to bottom, split the rocks, ^d and opened the graves and tombs, so that the bodies of several who were

^a The original phrase may denote a delivering up, or, as our Saviour expresses it, (Luke xxiii. 46.) a committing his spirit into the hands of God, as a sacred trust, to be restored again, and united to his body, at the time prefixed by his own infinite wisdom; and plainly implies such a dissolution, and actual separation of soul and body, as every common man undergoes when he dies. But herein is a remarkable difference, that what is in other men the effect of necessity, was in Jesus a voluntary act, and the effect of his own free choice. Hence the generality of interpreters have thought, that St John takes notice, that Christ bowed his head before he gave up the ghost; whereas, in common cases, the falling of the head follows after the breath's going out of the body; and hence also St Mark observes, that Jesus crying out with so loud and strong a voice, immediately before his expiring, was one reason that moved the centurion to think him an extraordinary person: for this showed that it was not the excess of pain and sorrow that had tired out nature, and hastened his death, but that he who (as himself professes, John x. 18.) had power to lay down his life, and could not have it taken from him without his own permission and consent, did freely and voluntarily lay it down, at such a time as himself saw convenient.—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. ii.

^b Some are of opinion, that this was the same earthquake that happened in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, and was the greatest that ever was known in the memory of man. Both Pliny and Macrobius make mention of it; and the latter informs us, that it destroyed no less than twelve cities in Asia. But by the sacred text it appears, that the earthquake here mentioned affected only the temple of Jerusalem, and the parts which are there specified, the veil, the ground, the rocks, the tombs, &c. Nor does it seem improbable, that this prodigy was shown particularly in this place, to foretell the destruction of the temple, and its worship, upon the people's sad impiety in crucifying the Lord of life.—Hammond's Annotations.

^c In the second temple, between the holy place, and the most holy, says Maimonides, there was no partition wall, though in the first temple there was one built of the thickness of a cubit. The division between them was made by two veils, one from the extremity of the holy place, and the other from the extremity of the most holy, with the void space of a cubit between. The like form of separation was observed in the temple which Herod rebuilt, as Josephus informs us, (Jewish wars, b. vi. c. 14.) and therefore it must be a mistake in those who think that this veil was a partition wall of stones. Whether of the two veils, that which belonged to the holy place, or that which hung in the most holy, was at this time rent in twain, is a question among the ancients; though the words of the author to the Hebrews, where he tells us, that 'Christ as our high-priest, has consecrated for us a new way through the veil, so that we may with boldness enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, Heb. x. 19, &c., seems to be a pretty clear determination of it.—Whitby's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^d In the church of the sepulchre, which stands on mount Calvary, is still to be seen that memorable cleft in the rock, occasioned, as it is said, by the earthquake which happened at our Lord's crucifixion. This cleft (as to what now appears of it) is about a span wide at its upper part, and two deep. After this it closes; but then it opens again below, and runs down to an unknown depth of earth. That this rent was made by the earthquake which happened at our Lord's passion, there is only tradition to prove; but that it is a natural and genuine breach, and not counterfeited by any art, the sense and reason of every one that sees it may convince him; for the sides of it fit like two tallies to each other, and yet it runs in such intricate windings, as could not be well counterfeited by art, or performed by any instrument.—Wells's Geog. of the New Test., part i. and Mr Maundrell's Journey, &c.

dead ^e arose, and went into Jerusalem, where they were seen, and known by many. These prodigies, which attended our Lord's death, struck the spectators with such amazement, that as they returned home, they smote upon their breasts, and, with great lamentation, declared that the person who had suffered that day, was innocent. Nay, the very centurion, ^f and other soldiers, who attended the execution, from a conviction of what they had seen, were not afraid to affirm, that he certainly was the Son of God.

The day whereon our Saviour suffered, was the eve, or preparation, to the Paschal festival, which fell that year on the Jewish sabbath-day, and so was a feast and sabbath together. That therefore so great and solemn a day might not be profaned ^g by the suspension of the ^e Since St Paul styles our Saviour, 'the first-born from the dead,' Col. i. 18. 'and the first fruits of them that slept,' 1 Cor. xv. 20, most commentators are of opinion that though several tombs were opened as soon as our Saviour expired, yet none of the saints arose until he returned from the grave. But then, who these saints were, it is no easy matter to conjecture. Some think, that the man after God's own heart, king David, or some of the ancient patriarchs, might best deserve this pre-eminence. But, on the day of Pentecost, St Peter tells the Jews plainly, that the body of David was still in the sepulchre, and not ascended into heaven, (Acts ii. 29—34.) and St Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews, tells us of the patriarchs, that 'they had not received the promise, God having designed that they without us, should not be made perfect,' Heb. xi. 39, 40. The most probable conjecture therefore is, that they were some of those who believed in Jesus, as old Simeon did, and died a little before his crucifixion; because, of these persons it is said, that they 'went into the holy city, and appeared to many;' and so, very probably, were well known to those to whom they appeared, as having been their cotemporaries.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^f 'This was the Son of God.' As the Roman officer and guard, who were ordered to attend the crucifixion of Jesus, were heathens, it becomes a difficult question in what sense they used these expressions. But since it can scarcely admit of doubt that the centurion, at least, knew on what grounds Jesus was condemned by the Jews, it may well be supposed that, on perceiving the miraculous circumstances accompanying his death, he exclaimed, 'this man was truly what he represented himself to be, the Messiah, the Son of God.' He was the 'just one' whose coming the Jews have looked for with so much anxiety. It does not follow that he comprehended the full force of these expressions; he might mean nothing more than that Jesus was an innocent man favoured by the gods; that he was merely a 'righteous man,' as St Luke has it, (chap. xxiii. 47.) However understood, these expressions in the mouth of a soldier and heathen, form a strong attestation to the character and innocence of our Lord. It is worthy of observation that St Matthew mentions the centurion, and they that were with him, as using these words, but St Mark, (xv. 39.) and St Luke, (xxiii. 47.), only the former, but it is easy to reconcile them. The sacred writers sometimes use the plural, when only one person is meant, or both the officer and the soldiers may have made similar observations, though with some variety of expression; and it may be more than once; which will account for the differences in the narratives of the evangelists.—Holden's Christian Expositor.—Ep.

^g The Jews had a strict injunction in their law, that the dead bodies of those who were executed should not hang all night, but by all means be buried that day, (Deut. xxi. 22, 23.) But the Romans used to do otherwise; they suffered the bodies to hang upon the cross always until they were dead, and, in some cases, a considerable time longer. On this occasion, it seems as if the Jews had left the Romans to follow their own custom, in relation to the crucified persons, and were in no concern to have them taken down, had it not been for the near approach of their Passover, whose joy and festivity they thought might be damped by so melancholy a sight. Upon this account they petition Pilate to have them removed; and the reason why Pilate might be rather induced to grant their request was, that the Romans themselves bodies on the cross, the rulers of the Jews came, and requested of Pilate, that their legs might be broken, to hasten their deaths, and their bodies taken down; which accordingly was executed upon the two thieves; but when the soldiers came to Jesus, and found him already dead, instead of breaking his legs, ^a one of them pierced his side with a spear, ^b from which issued out a great quantity of ^c blood and water.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5412. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

Among the disciples of our Lord, there was a name Joseph, a man of great wealth and honour, ^d born in Arimathæa, ^e and not improbably one of the council of the Sanhedrim, but who stood in some fear of them, while had such respect for the feasts of their emperors, that on those days they always took down the bodies from the cross, and gave them to their parents.—Calnet's Commentary.

^a The prophecy which foretold, 'that a bone of him should not be broken,' is usually referred to the command concerning the Paschal lamb, 'Thou shalt not break a bone of it,' (Exod. xii. 46.) But as David was likewise a type of Christ, we cannot see why it may not refer to these words of his, 'He keepeth all his bones, so that none of them is broken,' (Ps. xxxiv. 20.) or why the promise, which respects all righteous persons, might not more particularly be fulfilled in the just one.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^b The man who did this, was not one of the horse, as he is usually painted, but of the foot soldiers; because a spear, or short pike, was one part of the armour belonging to the Roman infantry. And the reason why this was done, was not only that a prediction concerning him might be fulfilled, (Zech. xii. 10.) which the Jews apply to the Messiah, but that his death might be put beyond all dispute, which, had it been doubtful, must have made his resurrection, upon which the truth of our religion depends, remain doubtful likewise.—Calnet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^c 'Blood and water.' Medical writers differ whether this was the small quantity of water in the pericardium, or what is called lymph, or a watery effusion such as sometimes is found in the cavities of the pleura in cases of violent death. There may, however, have been something miraculous in the phenomenon, but there is not a shadow of proof that it was designed to convey a typical meaning. The soldier who pierced Jesus doubtless intended to dispatch him, if he were not quite dead; and the issuing of blood and water was clear evidence that the wound would have been mortal had he been then living.—Holden's Christian Expositor.—Ed.

^d His riches and honourable station are mentioned, not out of any vanity and ostentation, that a person of so considerable a figure should pay respect to the body of our blessed Lord; but, chiefly, to show how strangely God brought about an ancient prophecy concerning the Messiah, namely, that notwithstanding the infamous manner of his dying, he should 'make his grave with the rich at his death,' (Isa. liii. 9.) which in itself was a most unlikely thing, not only because the bodies of them that were crucified, did, by the Roman laws, hang upon the gibbet, sometimes until they were consumed, but because the Jews, though they did not allow of this severity to the dead, did nevertheless always bury their malefactors in some public, neglected, and ignominious place; and so, in all probability, must our Saviour have been treated, had not Joseph applied himself to the governor, in whose disposal the bodies of executed persons were.—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. ii.

^e Arimathæa, or Ramah, now called Ramlé, or Ramla, a pleasant town, beautifully situated on the borders of a fertile and extensive plain, abounding in gardens, vineyards, olive and date trees. It stands about thirty miles north-west of Jerusalem, on the high road to Jaffa. Rama and Lydda were the two first cities that fell into the hands of the Crusaders. The former being abandoned by its inhabitants in the night, was thrown open to the invaders; who made it their rendezvous, and place of feasting for three days. Dr Clarke describes Rama as being in a state of desolation and ruin, although making a considerable figure at a distance. Mr Buckingham represents it as covering a considerable space over a level plain, and containing about 5000 inhabitants, who are principally occupied in husbandry, for which the surrounding country is highly favourable. The principal our Saviour was alive. After his death ^f however, he took courage, and going to Pilate, begged leave of him to let him take down the body of Jesus, and bury it. The governor was surprised to hear that he was dead so soon; but being informed, by the centurion, that it actually was so, he ordered the body to be delivered to Joseph; who, for the present, wrapped it up in fine linen clothes, which he had provided for that purpose; and, at the same time, Nicodemus, ^g another private disciple of our Lord's, brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, with other spices and perfumes, to embalm his body, according to the manner of the Jews.

Not far from the place of execution, there was a garden ^h belonging to Joseph, where he had lately hewn commodities produced are corn, olive oil, and cotton, with some soap, and coarse cloth, the manufacture of the place. According to the same traveller, Rama bears marks of having been once a considerable city; for which its position on the high road from Jerusalem to Joppa, the principal port of the country, eminently favoured it. There are still to be seen the remains of some noble subterranean cisterns, not inferior either in extent or execution to many of those at Alexandria; being intended for the same purpose, namely, to serve in the time of war, as reservoirs of water. At this Rama, which was likewise called Ramathaim Zophim, as lying in the district of Zuph or Zophi, Samuel was born. (1 Sam. i.)—Mansford's Scriptural Gazetteer.—Ed.

^f It may well seem strange, that Joseph, who never durst openly profess a regard to Jesus while living, should now, when he had suffered all the ignominy of a malefactor, not stick to interest himself for his honourable interment. But besides that this might be an instance of the efficacy of those impressions which God makes upon men's minds, even at the most unlikely seasons of prevailing; the desire which Pilate had expressed to save our Lord's life, and avowed unwillingness to condemn him, together with the prodigies that had accompanied his crucifixion, and made now every heart relent, might be motive enough for him to go in boldly to Pilate, as St Mark expresses it, and beg the body of him, before it was taken from the cross. According to the Mishna, the nearest relations of those that suffered as criminals were not permitted to put their bodies into their family tombs, until their flesh was all consumed in the public sepulchres; and this might possibly be the reason why Joseph made such haste with his request to the governor, namely, that he might prevent our Lord from being cast into one of the public charnel houses, appointed for the reception of malefactors' bodies.—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. ii. and Calnet's Commentary.

^g This is the same ruler of the Jews, and 'master of Israel,' as the evangelist calls him, (John iii. 1, 10.) who, at our Lord's first coming to Jerusalem, after he had entered upon his ministry, held a private conference with him, and for ever after was his disciple, though he made no open profession of it, till after his passion. Whether it was before or after this time, that he received baptism from some of Christ's disciples, is a thing uncertain, but there is reason to believe, that the Jews, when they came to be informed of this, deposed him from the dignity of a senator, excommunicated him, and drove him out of Jerusalem. Nay, it is farther said, that they would have put him to death, but that, in consideration of Gamaliel, who was his uncle, or cousin-german, they contented themselves with beating him almost to death and plundering his goods. It is added likewise, that Gamaliel conveyed him to his country-house, where he provided him with things necessary for his support, and, when he died, buried him honourably by St Stephen.—Caimet's Dictionary, under the name.

^h This garden has been long since converted into a church, called the church of the sepulchre, as being built over the place where our Lord's sepulchre was. The sepulchre, as it is now exhibited, presents rather a singular and unexpected appearance to a stranger; who, for such a place, would naturally expect to find an excavation in the ground, instead of which, he perceives it altogether raised, as if artificially above its level. The truth is, that in the alterations which were made on Calvary, to bring all the principal places within the projected church, the earth around the sepulchre was dug away; so that, what was originally a cave in the earth, has now the appearance of a clost out of a ^a rock a sepulchre for his own proper interment. Having therefore embalmed our Saviour's body, and wound it up in the linen clothes, here they buried it, and, with a large stone cut out of the rock for that purpose, closed the mouth of the sepulchre. But Mary Magdalen, and the other women who were present at his death, and assisted at his burial, having taken good notice of the place where he was laid, went and prepared fresh spices for his farther embalment, as soon as the sabbath-day was over.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

On the sabbath-day the rulers of the Jews came to Pilate, and informing him, "that our Lord, whom they called an impostor, having, in his lifetime, made it his boast, that on the third day he would rise again from or grotto above ground. The sepulchre itself is about six feet square and eight high. There is a solid block of the stone left in excavating the rock, about two feet and a half from the floor, and running along the whole of the inner side; on which the body of our Lord is said to have been laid. This as well as the rest of the sepulchre, is now faced with marble; partly from the false taste which prevailed in the early ages of Christianity, in disguising with profuse and ill-suited embellishments the spots rendered memorable in the history of its Founder; and partly, perhaps, to preserve it from the deprecations of the visitants. This description of the holy sepulchre will but ill accord with the notions entertained by some English readers of a grave; but a cave or grotto, thus excavated in rocky ground, on the side of a hill, was the common receptacle for the dead among the Eastern nations. Such was the tomb of Christ; such that of Lazarus; and such are the sepulchres still found in Judæa and the East. It may be useful further to observe, that it was customary with Jews of property to provide a sepulchre of this kind on their own ground, as the place of their interment after death; and it appears that Calvary itself, or the ground immediately around it, was occupied with gardens; one of which belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, who had then recently caused a new sepulchre to be made for himself. It was this sepulchre, so close at hand, and so appropriate, which he resigned for the use of our Lord; little thinking, perhaps, at the time, how soon it would again be left vacant for its original purpose.—(Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer.) The church of the holy sepulchre, a splendid edifice, erected by the empress Helena, fourteen hundred years ago, was destroyed by fire in 1808. It has since been repaired, though in a style much inferior to the original edifice. Dr Clarke, however, is of opinion that another tomb, which he particularly describes, and not the one enclosed in the church, is really the place where Jesus was laid. See his disquisition on the subject in his Travels.—En.

^a There are several circumstances in the description of our Saviour's tomb, which contribute very greatly to the confirmation of the truth of his resurrection. As, 1st, The place of his interment was near adjoining to the city, that thereby the miracle of his resurrection might be better known to all the Jews, and his own apostles more especially. 2dly, His tomb was a new one, wherein never man before was laid; and therefore, when his body left this sepulchre empty, no suspicion could remain of its being any other body than that which Joseph had taken down from the cross, and disposed of in that place. 3dly, It was hewn out of a rock, incapable of being undermined, or dug through; and therefore there was no possible way for the person deposited in a place so contrived, to get out again, except only at the mouth or door of the cave. And yet, 4thly, A large stone, which according to Mr Maundrell, who saw it, is two yards and a quarter long, one broad, and one thick, closed up the entrance of it; all which were watched by a strong guard of sixty soldiers: so that, as the sentry would not suffer the body to be conveyed out by this way, the nature of the place would not allow it by any other; and therefore, had not our Lord been more than man, he could never have forced his passage out. Of such mighty significance it is to us, that so punctual a description is given the world of our blessed Lord's burial, and all the circumstances relating to it, since they all contribute great strength to these two most important articles of the Christian faith, the death and resurrection of Jesus.—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. ii. and Whitby's Annotations.

the dead, they therefore requested of him, that he would order the sepulchre to be kept under a strong guard, until that day was passed, lest his disciples should steal him away by night, and then give it out that he was risen from the dead, which might prove a more dangerous seduction to the people than any thing they had yet fallen into." Whereupon he gave them leave to take a detachment of the guard ^b of the temple, and to post them near the sepulchre: which accordingly they did; and to secure it against all private attempts, set a seal ^c on the stone that was at the mouth of it.

Early next morning, even just as the sun was rising, Mary Magdalen, and the other women, who, on Friday evening, had prepared spices and perfumes, went to the sepulchre to embalm again our Saviour's body, ignorant of the guard that was placed there. Their whole care and consultation in the way was, how they might get the large stone that was at the entrance removed. But, before they arrived at the place, an angel from heaven had rolled it away, ^d and sat upon it; at the sight of whom, for his countenance was like lightning, and at the noise of the earthquake which accompanied his appearance, the guards fell down like so many dead men, so that the women had free entrance into the sepulchre; but were not a little astonished to see the body gone, and an angel, in a refulgent habit, sitting in the place where it had lain. Frightened at this apparition, they made all the haste they could out of the sepulchre; but were met by another angel, in the like glorious apparel, who not only acquainted them with our Lord's resurrection, according to what he had foretold his disciples, but, to give them a fuller conviction, reconducted them into the sepulchre; showed them, that the place where he had lain was empty; and ordered them to go immediately and carry the apostles, but more especially ^e Peter, the news thereof. The women, accordingly, filled with fear, and joy, and wonder altogether, hastened to find out the apostles; to whom they related what they had heard and seen: but, instead of believing them, they looked upon this as no more than the product of a weak and frightened imagination.

^b It is generally supposed, that this guard of the temple was a large detachment of Roman soldiers, who, in the time of the feast, kept sentry in the gates of the temple, to prevent such disorders as might very well happen among such a large concourse of people: for by the sequel of their story, it appears, (Mat. xxviii. 11.) that they depended upon Pilate, were subject to his correction, and consequently, were not Levites, as some imagine, but Roman soldiers.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^c When Daniel was cast into the lions' den, it is said, 'That the king sealed the stone that was laid upon the mouth of it, with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords, that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel,' (chap. vi. 17.) And from hence some have supposed, that the stone wherewith our Lord's sepulchre was closed, was sealed with Pilate's signet, because it was a matter of public concern; as others have fancied that it was further secured by a great chain that went across it, and that the marks thereof were visible in the venerable Bede's time. All fables.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^d For an explanation of the apparent discrepancies in the accounts given by the evangelists, respecting our Lord's resurrection, the reader is referred to the supplementary chapter on the subject, chapter iii. of this Section.

^e Peter is here named, not as the prince of the apostles, but, as the fathers say, for his consolation, and to take off the scruple which might lie upon his spirits, whether after his threefold denial of his Master, with such horrid aggravations attending it, he had not forfeited his right to be one of our Lord's disciples.—Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR. A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END

Out of curiosity, however, Peter and John ran to the sepulchre, and found the thing true according to the women's report; the body gone, ^a the burying-clothes lying on the ground, and the napkin that was about his head, very carefully folded, and laid by itself. Notwithstanding this, such was their incredulity, ^b that they returned home, never supposing any thing else, but that somebody had taken him away. Mary Magdalene, who, by this time, was again returned to the sepulchre, staid behind the two apostles weeping; and, as she stooped down to look in, saw two angels in bright apparel, sitting where the body had lain, one at the head, and the other at the feet. As the angels were enquiring of her the occasion of her tears, and she telling them, that it was the loss of her Lord's body, she happened to turn herself round, and saw Jesus himself; but supposing him to be the master of the garden, where the sepulchre was, she desired of him, that if he had removed the body any where, he would be so kind as to let her know, that she might take care of it. Hereupon our Lord calling her by her name, she immediately knew him, and throwing herself at his feet, was going to embrace him: but he forbade her, upon the account that ^c 'he had not, as yet ascended to his Father;' and only required her to acquaint his apostles with his resurrection, and immediate ascension into heaven; which she failed not to do; but still they gave no credit to her report.

^a The custom of interment among the Jews, was to roll the dead body, (as we read our Saviour's was, John xix. 39, 40.) up in spices; which though they preserved it in some measure from corruption, by their gummy nature, could not but make the clothes that were used with them cling so close to the skin, as not to be drawn off without a great deal of time and difficulty. When therefore these coverings were found regularly pulled off, wrapped up, and laid by, this plainly shows, that the disciples could have no hand in stealing away the Master's body. For do thieves, after they have riddled an house, use to spend time in putting things in order again? Or can it enter into any sober man's thoughts, that they, who come by stealth, and in danger of their lives, as the disciples certainly must have done upon such an adventure, should thus stay to awaken the guard, and trifle away their time in such hazardous and unnecessary niceties? Had they been really engaged in this affair, they certainly would have taken away the body at once, without tarrying to unbind and undress it. And therefore the condition in which the sepulchre was found, to every considerate man, must be a sufficient confutation of that idle pretence of the Jews: 'His disciples came, and stole him away.'—The literal sense of the scripture vindicated, p. 383.

^b The remark of one of the ancients upon this subject is very good, that their doubting is the confirmation of our faith; and the more difficulty they showed in believing Christ's resurrection, the greater reason have we to believe it; because the testimony of those who themselves believe not till after full conviction, is, upon that account, much more credible.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c Various are the senses which interpreters have been pleased to affix to the reason which our Lord here assigns for his rejecting this woman's homage and embraces, 'I am not yet ascended to my Father.' Some imagine, that Mary, still retaining her notions of a temporal kingdom, concluded that our Lord was now risen on purpose to assume it, and therefore fell down to adore him; but that he, willing to raise her mind to spiritual and celestial thoughts, gave her to understand, that, as yet, it was not a proper time for her to make her addresses to him, because he was not yet ascended into heaven, from whence he was to administer his kingdom, and to send down the Holy Ghost, in order to form a spiritual communion between him and his true disciples.—Beausobre's Annotations. Others suppose that this woman imagined, that our Lord was risen again in the same manner that Lazarus did, namely, to live upon earth

In the mean time some of the guards, in a great fright, fled into the city, and related all that had happened to the chief-priests and rulers; who immediately assembled themselves to consult upon this important affair, and came at length to this resolution, namely, 'to bribe the soldiers with a large sum of money, and thereby engage them to give it out among the people, that, while themselves were asleep, the disciples of Jesus came, and stole him away; promising them withal, that, in case this their pretended neglect should come to the governor's ears, they would take care to pacify him.' The soldiers accordingly took the money, and obeyed their orders; and this ^d report was current among the Jews for many years after.

On this same day of Christ's resurrection, as two of his disciples were taking a walk in the afternoon, to a town called Emmaus, ^e and discoursing, as they went along, of what had lately happened; Jesus joined himself to their company, ^f but they knew him not: and observing that they looked melancholy, he asked them the

as he had done before; and that therefore to convince her of the contrary, he bid her not touch him as a mortal man, because 'I am not yet ascended into heaven;' but in a short time shall, and that is the place where you are to pay me your homage and adorations.—Calmel's Commentary. Others again say, that by a figure, common enough among grammarians, who frequently change one tense for another, our Saviour's words may denote, that he was not then about to ascend, but to stay many days upon earth; so that Mary might have space and opportunity enough to pay her adorations, and to satisfy herself in the truth of his resurrection.—Whitby's Annotations. But these, and several other interpretations of the like kind, are far from being natural, and seem calculated on purpose to exclude the notion of our Saviour's frequent ascensions during his stay upon earth after his resurrection, which, in the course of the subsequent answers, we hope to evince to be true.

^d Some are of opinion, that the report which the evangelist speaks of, as current among the Jews, was, not that our Lord's disciples came and stole him away, but that the soldiers were corrupted by the high priests to say so. This indeed gives a quite different turn to the thing, and is very favourable to the Christian cause; but yet, whoever considers the circular letters mentioned by Justin Martyr, which the rulers in Jerusalem sent to the principal Jews all the world over, concerning this fact, and the great pains which, as Tertullian informs us, they every where took to propagate it, together with the care which he and the other ancient apologists employed to confute this senseless, but malicious lie, must needs be of a contrary opinion, namely, that the report was spread, not against the Jewish rulers, but the Christian disciples, and was not quite extinct when St Matthew wrote his gospel, chap. xxviii. 15, which was much about eight years after Christ's death.—Calmel's Commentary.

^e Emmaus, which was afterwards made a city, and called Nicopolis, was at this time a small village, about seven miles distant from Jerusalem to the west, where it is supposed, by Bede and others, that either Cleophas, or his companion, had a house, which, by their importuning Jesus to go with them, seems not improbable, because they could not propose to entertain him so commodiously or hospitably in an inn.—Wall's Geography of the New Testament, part i. and Howell's History, in the notes.

^f Whether it was, that after his resurrection, his person was so considerably changed, that those who knew him before, could not easily distinguish him; or that he appeared in an habit quite different from what he used to wear, which, for some time, might hinder them from recollecting who he was; or that he suspended the operation of their senses, that he might have a better opportunity to instruct their understandings; or that by an extraordinary power, he withheld their eyes from perceiving him, by which, upon removing of that impediment, they immediately knew him; any of these causes will answer the purpose better, than that we should impute, as some do, their not know subject of their discourse, and what it was that made them so disconsolate? To which one of them replied, "That the subject of their discourse was too notorious even to escape the knowledge of the greatest stranger; that it was concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who indeed was a great prophet; one whom they expected would have been the king and redeemer of Israel; but to their great disappointment had of late been delivered to death by their rulers, and crucified. And, what is more astonishing, continued he, this very day, which is the third since his death, some women of our company, having been early at the sepulchre, and not finding the body, surprised us with an account, that they had seen a vision of angels, who assured them that he was alive; which, in part, was confirmed by some of our men too, who went to the sepulchre, and found it empty, but did not see him.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR. A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10.—END. MARK xi. 15.—END. LUKE xix. 45.—END. JOHN xii. 19.—END.

Hereupon our Lord took occasion to reprove their incredulity, and, from the testimony of the prophets, to convince them, that it was highly necessary the Messiah should suffer death, and rise again, in order to a glorious exaltation. As they drew near to the village, where they intended to spend that night, Jesus ^b seemed as if he had farther to go; but being unwilling to lose his good conversation, they, with some entreaty, ^c prevailed with him to stay. He did so: and as he was sitting at the table with them, took bread, blessed it, brake it, and delivered it to them, as he was wont to do; whereupon their eyes were opened, and they knew him; but immediately he vanished ^d out of their sight.

As soon as the two disciples had recovered from their surprise, they hastened to Jerusalem, where the apostles were met together, who upon their arrival, informed ing their master to their excessive grief and sorrow.—Calnel's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^a He who was the spokesman upon this occasion, is said to be Cleophas, Luke xxiv. 18. who was the brother of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary, and so the reputed uncle of Christ; whose son Simeon, (says Eusebius, b. iii. c. 10.) by the joint consent of the apostles then living, was made bishop of Jerusalem, after St James, as being the nearest of kin to our Saviour.—Hovell's History.

^b And so very probably he would have done, had not the disciples pressed him to stay with them. But supposing he had been resolved to abide with them, and was minded to try the temper of his fellow-travellers, we cannot from hence charge him either with dissimulation, or deceit: because, though our words ought to be the certain interpreters of our thoughts, and are therefore not to be employed so as to deceive any, yet walking hath no certain signification, nor was it ever instituted to be an indication of the mind.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c The original word in St Luke is κατεβιάσαντο, which our translation has rendered, 'they constrained him.' But how did they constrain him? Did they lay violent hands on him, and carry him in whether he would or not? The sequel shows—saying, 'abide with us; for it groweth late, and the day is far spent.' The expression in such cases, must always be interpreted according to popular usage. Usages, such as this, of expressing great urgency of solicitation by terms which, in strictness, imply force and compulsion, are common in every tongue. How little, then, is there of candour, or at least of common sense, in the exposition which has been given by some, of a like phrase of the same writer, chap. xiv. 23. 'Compel them to come in.'—Campbell on the Gospels.—Ev.

^d Origen is of opinion, that our blessed Lord for the forty days that he was upon earth after his resurrection, could make himself visible or invisible, when and to whom he pleased. It is not to be doubted, but that he had the same body that was deposited in the grave; but then, what the powers of a raised and glorified body, especially when in conjunction with the them that their Lord was certainly risen, and ¹ had appeared unto Peter; whilst they, in their turn, related what had happened to them in the country, how Jesus had walked, and conversed with them, and how they came to know him by breaking of bread. But notwithstanding all these testimonies, several among them remained still incredulous.

For fear of the Jews, the apostles had shut the door, and were now set down to supper in a private room, late in the evening, when our blessed Saviour came in, and saluted them; and, that they might not take him for a spirit, or phantom, but for the very person that was crucified in their sight, he showed them the wounds in his hands, his feet and his side. Nay, that he might cure them of all scruple and doubtfulness, he eat a piece of broiled fish, ^e and some honey-comb, before them all, and then, having a little upbraided them with their unbelief, he gave them several great and weighty instructions, an ability to understand the scriptures ^f more perfectly, a renovation of their commission to preach to all nations, ^g a power and authority to remit or retain sins, a communication of the blessed Spirit by breathing on them, and a promise of sending him more plentifully, to enable them to be witnesses ^h of his resurrection, be-

1 Cor. xv. 5.

Deity are, we cannot tell; only we may infer, that our Saviour could, at least with the same facility, disappear to his disciples now, as he did to the Jews, when they were about to stone him, John viii. 59. which, it is generally supposed, he did, by the medium of a cloud cast over his body.—Calnel's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^e This he did, not to satisfy any hunger that his body could suffer after its resurrection, but to prove to them that his body was truly raised, and himself was really present. And, since it cannot be supposed, that Christ in this action, designed any illusion, it follows from his very eating, that his body had those parts by which we chew our meat, and withal a stomach to receive it.—Whitby's Annotations.

^f This, the evangelist tells us, our Saviour did, by opening their minds, Luke xxiv. 45. for it is one thing, to open the scriptures themselves, or to explain them, and another to open their understandings to perceive them; and Christ, very probably, did the latter, by giving them now some first-fruits of that spirit of prophecy, which fell more plentifully on them at the day of Pentecost.—Whitby's Annotations.

^g Though the word ἔθνη does, in some particular places, signify the tribes and families of the Jews, exclusive of other people, and, in very many places, the nations of the heathen world, in opposition to the Jews; yet this we are to observe, that wherever mention is made of preaching the gospel, in order to gain converts to the Christian faith, the word relates primarily to the several parts of Judea, and to the Jews, whosoever they are in their dispersions abroad; then, secondarily, to the Gentiles mingled with the Jews; and finally, to the whole Gentile world, when, upon the Jews' rejecting the gospel, the apostles were forced to depart from them; for such the tenor of their commission, and such their constant practice was: 'It was necessary,' says Paul and Barnabas to the Jews, 'that the word of God should first have been spoken to you,' which refers, I suppose, to some precept of Christ, (see Matt. x. 6. and xv. 24.) which made it necessary, 'but seeing ye have put it from you, lo, we turn to the Gentiles,' Acts xiii. 46.—Hammond's Annotations.

^h As Christ's resurrection was a matter of fact, it must be proved by the testimony of eye-witnesses, who, if they be honest men, and suffer the greatest prejudices in their fortunes, reputation, and life, for this testimony, give us the greater reason to believe it. For their honesty will not suffer them, upon any account whatever, to deviate from the truth, their interest and prudence will not permit them, without any necessity laid upon them, to testify a falsehood, much more the grossest falsehood, to their utmost damage, and without any prospect fore they were to depart from Jerusalem. And thus ended the first day of the week, which, in honour of our blessed Saviour's resurrection, has ever since been kept as the sabbath ^a among Christians.

A. M. 4927. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

At the above mentioned appearance of our blessed Saviour, all the apostles, except Thomas, ^b were present; and when they recounted to him every particular that had happened in his absence, so far was he from giving his assent to them, that he openly declared, that, unless he had the utmost evidence ^c of sense, by putting his of advantage: and then, if they confirm this their testimony by all kinds of signs, miracles, and wondrous powers, exercised by themselves, and others who embraced their testimony, and if this be done in all places, and on all persons, for a whole age, or ages; this makes it a thing impossible, that they should thus attest a lie: and therefore our Lord bids his apostles stay at Jerusalem, till they were thus empowered, by virtue from on high, to confirm this testimony, (Acts i. 8.)—Whitby's Annotations.

^a The Jewish sabbath was at first instituted, not barely in commemoration of God's creating the world, but, as there is another reason subjoined, in memory of their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage: 'For remember, that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, therefore the Lord thy God commandeth thee to keep the sabbath-day;' (Deut. v. 15.) Now this bondage of theirs was an emblem of our captivity under sin, and their deliverance a type of our spiritual redemption. When therefore our redemption was accomplished, it became proper, that the day of sabbath should be altered; especially when the wise providence of God had so ordered matters, that the old Jewish sabbath, that is the seventh day, should be passed over, and the first made choice of, to be honoured with two such glorious miracles, as the resurrection of our blessed Lord from the dead, and the coming of the Holy Ghost from heaven. After this, indeed, we find the apostles frequenting the synagogue on the Jewish sabbath, but, from the time of their Lord's resurrection they never did it, as they did before, according to the commandment, (Luke xxiii. 56.) but according to custom, or as the manner was, (Acts xvii. 2.) and therefore we have reason to believe, that, from the very first, they looked upon the ancient sabbath as superseded by this other, which from the beginning they called ἡ Κυριακή, the Lord's day, and from the beginning employed in acts of religious worship. To which purpose we find Ignatius exhorting Christians, not to "sabbatize with the Jews, but to live according to the Lord's day, in which our life arose with him;" Epist. ad Mag. vol. iii.—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, and Whitby's Annotations.

^b What might be the occasion of this apostle's absence is variously conjectured. Some are of opinion, that, as all fled from their Master, when he was apprehended in the garden, they did not so soon assemble again, but by degrees dropped in, one by one, as they recovered from their fright: and that therefore, at this time, Thomas was not returned to the company. But others, from the natural temper of this apostle, as it appears from the scripture passages where he is concerned, to be very scrupulous, and hard of belief, do rather think, that taking offence at the apostles' easy credulity, as he deemed it, and looking upon all that the women from the sepulchre, and the two disciples from Emmaus, had said, as so many idle tales, he left the company in pure disgust, not long before our Saviour came in.—Calmet's Commentary, and Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

^c The manner by which the apostle might bring himself to this resolution, might possibly be by some such arguments as these:—"Jesus of Nazareth was put to death upon the cross; and, being dead, was laid and sealed up in a sepulchre, which was strictly watched by a guard of soldiers: but I am told, and required to believe, that, notwithstanding all this, he is risen, and indeed alive. Now, surely, things suitable to the stated course of nature should be believed before such as are quite beside it; and for a dead man to return to life is preternatural, but that those who report it may be mistaken, is very natural and usual. Dead I saw him; but that he is risen I only hear. In what I see with mine own eyes, I cannot easily be deceived; but in what I only hear, I may, and often am. Here being two things then proposed to my belief, my reason tells me, that I ought to choose that which is most credible; but it seems more credible, finger into the holes in his hands and side, he would not believe a word of what they told him. On the Sunday following therefore, when, in the same place, they all met together, with the doors shut for fear of the Jews, and Thomas was with them, Jesus came, and standing in the midst of them, saluted them as formerly, with the blessing of peace. After that, turning to Thomas, he offered him the satisfaction which he desired, namely, the feeling his hands, and his side, where the nails and the spear had pierced; which when the apostle had done, and upon conviction cried out in transport, 'My God, and my Lord!' ^d our Saviour gave him to understand, that his believing, after such a demonstrative evidence, was neither so praiseworthy, nor rewardable, as was the faith of those who had not the like conviction.

After this appearance to the apostles in a full body, they all resolved, pursuant ¹ to their Lord's directions, to leave Judea, and return into their own province of Galilee. They had not been long there, before Peter, and several others of them, went a fishing ^e in the lake or sea of Tiberias, but after much toiling all night, they caught nothing. In the morning, as they were making to shore, a person, ^f unknown to them, being informed of their ill success, advised them to cast their net on the right side of the ship, which, when they had done, they enclosed so great a number of large fishes, as made John suspect that the person on shore might possibly be their master. This he no sooner suggested to Peter, that a small number of witnesses, frightened and disturbed as they are, should be deceived, or, as honest as once they were, may conspire to deceive me, than that one should rise from the dead; and therefore, excepting," &c.—Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

¹ Mat. xxvi. 32.—xxviii. 7.

^d This is a noble confession of the apostle's faith, wherein he not only recognises Jesus for the Messiah, the very same Lord to whom he had been a servant and companion during the space of his ministry, but owns likewise, and proclaims his divine nature. For the original here is in terms so strict, and with such an addition of the Greek article, as the very heretics, and enemies to truth, confess to be the character of the word of God, when taken in its proper sense, and intended of the true God only. Nor can the words, if put for a note of admiration only, be of force sufficient to express any conviction in Thomas; because expressions of wonder, though they properly speak astonishment and surprise, do not always imply belief, and may therefore import the strangeness, without the truth, of the thing: whereas our Saviour, in his answer to Thomas, 'Because thou hast seen, thou hast believed,' (John xx. 29.) accepts this as a full and sufficient declaration of his assent; and therefore, to make it such, we must admit that that paraphrase, which some ancient translations supply it with, by reading, 'Thou art my Lord, thou art my God.'—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. ii.

^e The apostles, as such had nothing to do, until the Holy Ghost should descend upon them; and, among the Jews, it was accounted a disgrace to be idle. Since fishing therefore was the ordinary occupation of several of them in this intermediate time, they thought it the best way to betake themselves to it, and that, not only to keep themselves employed, but to supply their own want of necessaries likewise, until they should have a proper call to the ministry, when, in all probability, they gave over the labours of their secular employ, and devoted themselves entirely to that work.—Grotius's Annotations.

^f By this one would think, that our blessed Lord, after his resurrection, was not a little changed in his outward appearance, since his apostles, notwithstanding more interviews than one, could not so readily distinguish him, either by his voice or looks. Upon this occasion, however, he seems by his question, John xxi. 5. to personate one who might be come to buy some fish of them, and under this guise, whilst they were busy and employed, might more easily pass upon them.—Calmet's Commentary.

A. M. 4087. A. D. 33; OR. A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

but Peter, impatient of delay, throws on his coat, ^a and jumps into the sea, and gets to land, while the other apostles had much ado to haul the vessel, and the net so loaded with fish, safe to shore. The number of the fishes was an hundred and fifty; but, what was more surprising, at their landing, they found a fire ready made, fish broiling on it, and bread standing by. This notwithstanding our Lord ordered them to bring some of those which they had caught, and having ^b asked them to sit down with him, he not only distributed to them, but eat ^c some of the bread and fish himself, to give them a still farther assurance of the reality of his resurrection.

When dinner was ended, he entered into conversation with Peter; and having thrice demanded ^d of him, if he loved him, and thrice received a declaration that he did; he, each time, enjoined him to take care of the flock which he had committed to him. After this, in a figurative speech, he signified to him, by what manner of death he was to glorify God, even by crucifixion; ^e but,

^a The text tells us, that he was 'naked' before; but what is called 'naked' signifies only to have part of the body 'uncovered.' or to be without a gown, or upper garment, according to the custom of the eastern people, and of the Romans, who, when they went abroad, or made any public appearance, wore a long upper garment called in Latin 'Toga.' Of this kind was what the evangelist calls 'a fisher's coat;' and from hence it seems pretty plain, that Peter did not swim, as it is usually thought, but wade to land; since, if decency was the motive of putting on his coat, he could not have preserved that decency, had he come dripping wet, as he must have done, upon the supposition of his swimming, into his master's presence.—Howell's History, in the notes, and Calmet's Commentary.

^b The fire, fish, and bread, on the shore, were all created, and produced by Christ out of nothing, to evidence, at this time, his divine power, but, lest there should be thought any delusion in these, he ordered likewise some of the others, that were just then taken, to be dressed; and, that they might not take him for an apparition only, he invited them to dine with him. As therefore by the miracle of creating, and miraculously catching the fishes, he proved himself to be a God; so, by his present eating of the fish, he evinced himself to be a man, and consequently teacheth us, that our exalted high priest continues our kinsman in heaven.—Hammond's and Burkitt's Annotations.

^c It is not indeed said expressly, that at this time he did eat: but, since St Peter tells us, that 'they did eat and drink with him, after he rose from the dead,' Acts x. 41. and St Luke testifies, that, on another occasion, he did eat before them, chap. xxiv. 42, 43. as he did it then for the confirmation of his resurrection, it is hardly to be doubted, but that he did it now for the same end.—Whitby's Annotations.

^d Our Saviour's words to St Peter are, 'Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?' John xxii. 15. More than these? What? Some will tell us, that our Saviour here pointing at the nets and fishing boats, demanded of Peter, whether he loved him and his service better than his ordinary employment and occupation; but this is a forced and jejune exposition. The apostle, to be sure, before our Lord's being taken into custody, had been very liberal in his professions of love to him. He had promised to go with him to prison and to death; and, to show how much he surpassed the rest of his brethren, 'though all should be offended because of thee,' says he, 'yet will not I,' Matt. xxvi. 33. and yet upon the approach of the first danger, he forgot all his promises, and behaved more ingloriously than the rest. It is in allusion, therefore to this, that our Lord begins this discourse with Peter: that he calls to his mind his former speeches, and contrary performances: and, by thrice repeating this question, 'Peter, lovest thou me?' in respect of his three denials, and at first adding the words 'more than these,' in regard to his magnifying his love, above all others, he now engages him, by the sense and consideration of his fall, to a better discharge, and a more constant expression of his love, in converting men to the faith of Christ.—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations.

^e The occasion of his being put to death is generally reported when Peter desired to know the fate of his favourite apostle St John, instead of gratifying his curiosity, he required him rather to attend to his own concerns, and as he was to resemble him in the manner of his death, so to endeavour to imitate him in his deportment under it. ¹ 'If I will that he stay till I come, ^f what is that to thee; Follow thou me.' This answer of our Saviour's, however, gave occasion to a report among the rest of the disciples, ^g that John was never to die; but ² himself refuted that opinion in his gospel, and, by surviving the fate of Jerusalem, verified what our Saviour meant.

After this, our Lord having appointed a solemn meeting of as many of his disciples as could conveniently be got together, and named a certain mountain in Galilee ^h for that purpose, he there appeared, not only to the eleven apostles, but ³ to five hundred brethren at once. Here he acquainted his apostles, that all power, both in heaven and earth, was given unto him; commanded them to instruct all nations, and baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and to press them to the observation of all his precepts; foretold them what mighty signs ⁱ and wonders would to be,—that he, assisted by St Paul, had at Rome confounded the diabolical illusions of Simon Magus: whereupon Nero, who was a favourite of magicians, being provoked, or as others think, to ingratiate himself with the people of Rome, after he had fired their city, gave orders for his being put to death, which the prefects, in the emperor's absence, took care to see executed upon him and St Paul at the same time. The latter, as a denizen, was beheaded with a sword; but St Peter, who had no such claim to the like privilege, was sentenced to crucifixion. This, and the torment preparatory to it, he underwent with marvellous patience, and, as a mark of his humility, requested, and obtained, to have his body fastened to the cross, with his head downwards, as judging it too great an honour to suffer in the same manner and posture that his Lord had done before him.—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. iv.

¹ John xxi. 22. ² Ibid. xxi. 23. ³ 1 Cor. xv. 6.

^f That is, come in judgment to take vengeance on the Jews. For though there are but two personal advents mentioned in Scripture; the first, when our Lord came into the world to redeem it; and the second when he shall return again to judge; yet this is no objection against his intermediate advent, which was not personal by any visible descent of his from heaven, but virtual, and effected by his sending the Roman army against the Jews, and giving signs from heaven and in the clouds of their approaching ruin. So that the sense of our Saviour's words is—'If my pleasure is, that he live till the dissolution of the Jewish state;' and accordingly, we find that, though Peter was put to death under Nero, yet St John continued even to the time of Trajan's reign, above an hundred years after our Saviour's birth, and so thirty years after that this coming of his was past.—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations.

^g Because the Christians, at that time, by the coming of Christ, understood the last judgment; whereas our Saviour intended it of the destruction of Jerusalem, which, in effect, was a full emblem of the final dissolution of all things.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^h This mountain is generally supposed to be Tabor, the place where our Lord was transfigured, though some suppose it to be one that stood nearer the lake of Tiberias.—Calmet's Commentary.

ⁱ We are not to suppose, however, that our Lord promised the gift of miracles, to every Christian convert; since this would have made miracles, which should only be employed on important occasions, where the glory of God, or the good of mankind is concerned, too common, and consequently of no validity at all. So that this promise, though expressed in general terms, must necessarily be limited to the apostles, and apostolic men. Of their casting out devils, healing diseases, and speaking with new tongues, we have instances almost innumerable. Their taking up serpents seems to be foretold by that Sybil, from whose oracles Virgil very probably borrowed this verse of his:

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END attend those who were true converts to his religion; and promised them his daily protection ^a and assistance, even unto the end of the world.

Forty days was the time pre-ordained for our Lord's continuance upon earth after his resurrection. These days were now almost expired, when the apostles, according as they were ordered, with some of their select friends, returned to Jerusalem, and there assembled themselves in a private place. Our blessed Saviour came to them; and, among other things, ¹ relating to the government of his church, gave them particularly in charge, that they should not depart from ^b Jerusalem, until they had received that miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost ^c

¹ Acts i. 3.

“The serpent shall perish, and the deceitful poisonous herb.” And from St Paul it appears, that this promise was literally fulfilled, who, after a viper had fastened upon his hand for some time, shook it off into the fire without receiving any hurt, (Acts xxviii. 5.) And as to the drinking of deadly poisons, we have it recorded by Papias, of Barsabas, surnamed the just; by Ado, in his martyrology, of the Cæcilian soldier; and by Gregory of Tours, of Sabinus, bishop of Canoso; that they three did this without any mischief to themselves. But as miracles of this kind were more liable to exceptions, than such as were performed upon unbelievers, men being apt to think, that there might be some antidotes against the venom of these beasts, or the pernicious effects of these draughts, it must be owned, that providence thought fit to be more sparing in affording these.—Calmet's Commentary, Hanmond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^a Our Saviour's words are,—‘Lo, I am with you always to the end of the world,’ (Mat. xxviii. 20.), where we must observe, that this promise was made, not to all Christians in general, but only to those whom Christ authorised to teach and baptize in his name, as the words themselves, and the occasion of speaking them, plainly show; and it contains a full declaration of our Lord's intention, that they should always be succeeded by others in the same office. For since the apostles all died within the compass of fourscore years, after this extensive promise was made, it could no ways be fulfilled but by our Lord's being with their successors in the gospel-ministry until the world's end. For what some imagine, that the συντελεία τοῦ αἰῶνος relates to the end of the Jewish age or economy, which lasted, as they say, to the destruction of the temple under Vespasian, and so confine this promise to the persons of the apostles only, is void of all foundation, unless we can suppose, that all sacred functions were to cease; neither baptism to be administered, nor the gospel preached after the destruction of Jerusalem, which is false in fact: and therefore, if we may be allowed to explain the design and meaning of this promise by the manner of its completion, we must conclude, that our Lord here engages himself to be present with his ministers, both by his special grace, and his authority, after the end of the Jewish economy, as well as till that time; and hence we may assure ourselves, that the ministry of the word, and administration of the sacraments, are a standing and perpetual ordinance, to continue in the Christian church throughout all ages; and that all the faithful ministers of Christ, in what part of the world soever God shall cast their lot, and what time soever they shall happen to live, may comfortably expect Christ's gracious presence with their persons, and his blessing upon their labours.—Archbishop Potter's Church government, c. iv. and Burkitt's Annotations.

^b Of all places the apostles would least of all have chosen Jerusalem to tarry in, had not our Lord positively commanded them to continue there. For Jerusalem was now a place justly abhorred and detested by them, as reeking fresh with the blood of the holy and innocent Jesus; and yet Jerusalem is the place chosen by Christ for the pouring forth of his Holy Spirit upon his apostles; because there was the greatest company of spectators to behold it, and to be wrought upon by it; and because there had been the scenes of his greatest humiliation, and therefore he was minded to show forth his power and glory.—Burkitt's Annotations.

^c The reasons assignable for this wonderful dispensation, are, 1. To enable them to be powerful witnesses of our Lord's resurrection, (Luke xxiv. 48.), and consequently that he was the true Messiah, or the prophet who was to come into the world, and was to be the Saviour of it: and therefore St Peter speaks thus to the Jews, ‘Ye have killed the prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead, of which we are witnesses,’ (Acts iii. 15.) 2. To enable them to give an exact account, as far as divine wisdom saw it necessary, of what our Saviour did and taught: and therefore himself tells them, that ‘the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father, should testify of him, and bring all those things to their remembrance, which he had said unto them,’ (John xv. 26.—xiv. 26.) And 3. To make them able ministers of the New Testament, that is, able to acquaint Christians with all saving truths, and to teach them all things that Christ had commanded to be observed, throughout all the ages of the church; and upon the strength of this promise, all Christians, in all ages, have believed, that the apostles and writers of the New Testament, both spake and wrote as they were moved or directed by the Spirit of God, and accordingly have received their doctrines, ‘not as the words of men, but as they were in truth, the word of God,’ (1 Thess. ii. 13.)—Whitby's Annotations.

^d Thus the apostles preached in the most considerable cities of the then known world, as at Antioch, Alexandria, and even at Rome itself, as well as at Jerusalem and Samaria. They taught at Athens, and Corinth, and throughout all Greece, in such towns as were most learned, most corrupt, and most idolatrous. It was in the presence of all nations, of Greeks and barbarians, of the learned and the ignorant, of Jews and Romans, of princes and their people, that the disciples of Jesus Christ gave witness of the wonders they had ‘seen with their eyes, heard with their ears, and touched with their hands,’ and particularly of their Lord's resurrection: which testimony they supported, without any interest, and against all the reasons of human prudence, even to their last breath, and sealed it with their blood. Such was the establishment of Christianity!—Fleury's Church History.

^e The custom among the Jews was, to give the benediction to a good number or congregation of people, with an elevation and extension of the hands, as appears from the practice of Aaron, Lev. ix. 22. But to any particular person, the blessing was given with the imposition of hands, as the example of Jacob, with regard to Ephraim and Manasseh, plainly shows, Gen. xlviii. 14.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f This must be understood of his human nature only, because the divine nature fills all places, both in heaven and earth, and is at all times incapable of that which we properly call ‘motion.’ The same body of Christ therefore, which was born, and suffered and died, was actually carried up thither: and so our Saviour's ascension was no imaginary and figurative, but a real, proper, and corporal ascent into heaven, and that in the most elevated part and noblest signification that this word, at any time does, or can possibly admit; and therefore he is said to have entered into the holy place, Heb. ix. 12. and to have ‘ascended up far above all heavens,’ Eph. iv. 10. into the ‘presence of God and where he was before,’ John vi. 62. So that, whatever heaven is higher than all the rest which are called heaven; whatever sanctuary is holier than all which are called holies, whatever place is of greatest dignity in all those courts above,

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 10—END. sitteth at the "right hand of God," ¹ "God blessed for ever." Amen. ⁶

CHAP. II. Objections answered, and difficulties obviated.

St Paul, in his epistle to the Philippians, argues, from the majesty of Christ's divine nature, to the greatness of his condescension in becoming the Son of man, "who being in the form of God," as he expresses it, "thought it no robbery to be equal with God, but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in the fashion of a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death."² In this state of humiliation, it was highly proper and suitable to his character, to speak modestly of himself, and to make use of the lowest title that he had, as best becoming his present condition.

But there is another reason which some have assigned for the frequent use that he makes of this appellation: and that is, its being a prophetic name, whereby Daniel has thought fit to describe the promised Messiah. ³ ⁴ into that place did our Saviour ascend, where, in the splendour of his deity, he was before he took upon him our humanity: as our learned bishop Pearson fully and elegantly expresses it; art. 4. and Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. iii.

¹ Rom. i. 25. ² Phil. ii. 6, &c. ³ Dan. vii. 13, 14.

^a This is one of those expressions wherein the Holy Ghost condescends to our capacity, by attributing to God the parts and gesture of a human body. The hand is the chief instrument of exerting our strength, and therefore often used to denote the power of God. The right-hand is the usual place of honour and respect, and therefore this denotes the highest dignity. Sitting, in like manner, intimates a state of ease and rest, and is properly the posture of those that are in power and authority, of kings upon their thrones, and magistrates in courts of justice; and therefore "Christ's sitting at God's right hand," implies thus much,—"that the same bliss, glory, and power, which, as the Son of God, he did before his incarnation enjoy with his Father, from all eternity, his human nature is now made partaker of in the highest heavens; that this God-man is invested with an absolute authority, and boundless dominion, and does now, in both natures, rule, as he shall one day judge, the whole world; and that till that day come, it is the duty of us, and all mankind, to reverence and obey, to trust in, and pray to him, as our only head and king, our rightful and universal Lord."—Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. iii.

^b In this illustrious manner did the Saviour depart, after having finished the grand work which he came down upon earth to execute: a work which God himself, in the remotest eternity, contemplated with pleasure, which angels anciently, and superior natures, with joy described as to happen, and which through all eternity to come shall, at periods the most immensely distant from the time of its execution, be looked back upon with inexpressible delight by every inhabitant of heaven. For though the little affairs of time may vanish altogether and be lost, when they are removed far back by the endless progression of duration, this object is such, that no distance however great can lessen it. The kingdom of God is erected upon the incarnation and sufferings of the Son of God, the kingdom and city of God comprehending all the virtuous beings that are in the universe, made happy by goodness and love; and therefore none of them, can ever forget the foundation on which their happiness stands firmly established. In particular the human species, recovered by this labour of the Son of God, will view their deliverer, and look back on his stupendous undertaking with high ravishment, while they are feasting without interruption on its sweet fruits, ever growing more delicious. The rest of the members likewise of the city of God will contemplate it with perpetual pleasure, as the happy means of recovering their kindred that were lost, and it may be as the grand confirmation of the whole rational system, in their subjection to him who liveth and reigneth for ever, and whose favour is better than life.—M. Knight's Harmony.—Ed.

saw in the night vision,' says he, 'and behold, one like the Son of man, came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the ancient of days: and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people nations, and languages, should serve him.' It is in allusion to this therefore, as these men think, and in order to assert his claim to the office of the Messiah, that our Saviour so commonly calls himself by that name.

However this be, it is certain, that he is not so fond of the name of the Son of man, as not to desire to be considered in the capacity of the Son of God likewise. For, when he put the question to his disciples, "Whom say ye that I am?" and Peter, in the name of the rest, replied, "Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God," he is far from being displeased with the answer, when he returns the apostle this compliment, "blessed art thou, Simon Barjonas, for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father that is in heaven."

Our Saviour indeed was so far from making any unnecessary declarations of himself, that, ⁵ on some occasions, we find him labouring to conceal his divine character, and charging his disciples to say nothing of it, until his resurrection: ⁶ but, notwithstanding this, whenever he was fairly called upon, and especially by persons invested with authority, he never concealed it. When ⁶ the Jews came around him in Solomon's porch, and said unto him, "how long dost thou make us doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plain:" his answer is express: "I told you, and you believed not; the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me: for I and my Father are one." When he stood before the judgment-seat, and the high-priest demanded of him, ⁷ "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us, whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God;" his reply is, "Thou hast said," or, as St Mark ⁸ expresses it, "I am; and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Nay, there are some instances, wherein, of his own accord, and without any demand of this kind, he freely discovers who he was; for having cured the man that was born blind, and afterwards meeting him accidentally, ⁹ "dost

⁴ Mat. xvi. 15, &c. ⁵ See Mark viii. 30, and Mat. xvii. 9. ⁶ Jno. x. 23, 24. ⁷ Mat. xxvi. 63, 64. ⁸ Chap. xiv. 62. ⁹ Jno. ix. 35. sure, as the happy means of recovering their kindred that were lost, and it may be as the grand confirmation of the whole rational system, in their subjection to him who liveth and reigneth for ever, and whose favour is better than life.—M. Knight's Harmony.—Ed.

^c That Christ was very cautious of acknowledging himself to be the promised Messiah, in his conversing with the Jews, is very apparent: (compare Mat. xvi. 20. Mark viii. 29, 30; Luke xxii. 67, and John x. 24,) and the reason was, that the Jews had such notions of the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, that they would have construed an open declaration of himself under that character as a claim to the throne of David; in consequence of which, many would have taken up arms in the cause, (John vi. 15.) and others would have accused him to the Roman governor, as a rebel against Cæsar, (Luke xx. 20.) as they afterwards did, (Luke xxiii. 2.)—This Mr Locke has stated at large in his Reasonableness of Christianity, p. 59—77. Yet I think there was a nicety in Christ's conduct, beyond what is there represented: for our Lord in effect declared the thing, while he declined that particular title; and in a multitude of places, represents himself as the Son of man, and the Son of God, which were both equivalent phrases, and generally understood by the Jews, though a Roman would not so easily have entered into the force of them. Accordingly we find this interpretation was in fact given to them, (John vii. 31, 41. and ix. 22.)

A. M. 4377 A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 29—END.

thou believe on the Son of God?' says he: whereupon the man asking, 'who is the Son of God, that I may believe on him?' our Saviour replies, 'Thou hast both seen him, and he it is that talketh with thee.'

Though therefore our blessed Saviour delighted much in the appellation of the Son of man; yet as he did not, upon that account, decline the title of the 'Son of God,' and had consequently two natures united in the same person, our business must be, to distinguish between these two natures, and then we shall soon perceive the reason of our Saviour's informing his apostles, that his Father was greater than him, namely, greater with respect to the Son's humanity, though, as touching their divinity, they are perfectly equal; or greater, as he is the Father, and consequently the fountain and original of the Godhead, though their nature and essence be one and the same.

¹ In the very notion of paternity and filiation, there is some kind of subordination implied; but then we are to observe, that this is not a subordination of nature and substance, nor of essential attributes, or natural properties, but merely a personal subordination, founded on the personal properties: and, to be satisfied in this, we need only consider, that the communication of the essence, upon which this subordination is grounded, is only a personal action, and not an act or attribute of the divine essence. To generate, and to be generated, are not essential attributes of the divine nature, but merely personal acts of the Father and Son; and, consequently, the sole foundation of this subordination being merely in personal properties, the subordination itself, founded therein, can only relate to the personal, and not at all to the essential properties; for, notwithstanding the Son's personal subordination, he still continues, with the Father in substance equal, in majesty, co-eternal.

When therefore our Saviour seems to own his inferiority of knowledge, and to profess himself ignorant of some future events, that the Father had reserved to himself, the meaning must be, ² Either that as man, he did not know beyond the capacities of a human and finite understanding, and not what he knew as God; or that, as a prophet sent from God, he had no commission to declare it, and what was no part of his prophetic office, he knew nothing of, that is, had no instructions to reveal it. For, that in this sense ^a the original word is sometimes taken, we may learn from that passage to the Corinthians, where St Paul tells his disciples, that ^b he had determined not to know any thing among them, that is, not to teach or instruct them in any point of doctrine, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

"It is one thing therefore," says the learned ³ Light-foot, "to understand the Son of God, barely, and abstractly, for the second person in the Holy Trinity, and another, to understand him for the Messiah, or second person incarnate. To say, that the second in the Trinity is ignorant of any thing, is blasphemous: but to say so of the Messiah, though he be that second person in the Trinity, is not so. For, though the second person, abstractly considered, according to his mere Deity, be co-equal with the Father, co-omnipotent, co-omniscient, co-eternal with him; yet the Messiah, who is God-man, considered as the Messiah, was a servant and a messenger to the Father, from whom he received commands and authority, as himself frequently declared, ⁴ 'that he spake nothing of himself, but that the Father, who sent him, gave him commandment what he should say, and what he should speak.'" Though therefore it plainly appears, both from the many prognostics which he mentions, and the exact description which he gives of the destruction of Jerusalem, that our Saviour could not but know the precise day and hour of its happening, yet this he might call one of ⁵ 'those times and seasons which the Father had put in his own power,' because he had received no order or direction for him to reveal it.

The generality of the ancients however run into the other notion, which arises from the consideration of the two natures in Christ; and therefore, with Cyril of Alexandria, they say, that he sometimes declared himself as God, and sometimes as man, thereby to show, that he was very God, and very man; that as he was pleased, in respect of his manhood, to suffer hunger and thirst, and other inconveniences of that kind, so he condescended to take upon him the innocent infirmities of it, among which ignorance of future events is one, but this without any disparagement to his ⁶ 'Godhead, wherein are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge;' and that, in short, he both knew, and knew not, when the day and hour here spoken of would come; the former, with respect to his divine, and the latter, to his human nature.

This solution however does not please so well. For, if we refer the day and hour, as they were primarily intended, to the destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem, what signs and prognostics does our Saviour give his disciples of this great event? Why he foretels them, That not one stone of all these glorious buildings should be left upon one another: that there should be wars and rumours of wars, when nation should rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; that there should be famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places; that false prophets, and false Christs, should arise, who should amuse them with destructive hopes of imaginary deliverances; that Jerusalem should be encompassed with a foreign enemy, who should at last make a final destruction of it, and of all that was therein; that the abomination of desolation should stand in the holy place, where, of all places in the world, it ought not to have stood; and that all these things should come to pass, while some of the present generation were still alive. ⁷ Now, since all these things did literally come to pass, as our Lord, forty years before, had foretold that they should; since, at the time of his foretelling them, the Romans were in peaceable possession of Judea, nor was there any prospect at all of the troubles and commotions which afterwards ensued; and since the completion of these prophecies is preserved to us by a Jewish writer, who himself was concerned in these very troubles, and did not record them with any design to gratify us Christians; can we imagine, that Jesus Christ, who was this prophet, could possibly be

¹ Stevens on the eternal generation.

² Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part ii. p. 60.

³ 1 Cor. ii. 2.

⁴ On Mark xiii. 32.

^a For an explanation of this passage, (Mat. xiii. 32)—See note to 1001. p.—Ed.

⁵ John xii. 49.

⁶ Acts i. 7.

⁷ Col. ii. 3.

⁸ Wetton's Omniscience of the Son of God.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

ignorant of the day and hour when these predictions should be completed? or rather, ought we not to think, that all he intended by that expression, was to signify to his hearers, that it was then an improper time for him to reveal the particular period when that catastrophe was to overtake them? But two days after this, his disciples own his divinity, and acknowledge, that ¹ he knew all, and ² all things that he had heard from the Father, or had a commission to declare from the Father, himself avers, that he had not failed to make known unto them; and therefore we may well presume, that the individual day and hour when Jerusalem was finally to be destroyed, as it was a matter of no concern for them to be acquainted with, so was it no part of his instructions from heaven to let them into a minute knowledge of it; that in the signs and forerunners which he had discovered to them, he had said enough to put them, and all considering men, upon their guard; that fuller and more particular indications of the time, as things then stood, were by no means proper; for though they might possibly be able to ³ bear his words, yet others might be tempted to make an ill use of them, contrary to his original meaning.

It is to be observed, however, that, in regard our blessed Saviour had the divine and human nature both united in one person, great caution must be used, in observing his actions and affections, that we do not mistake in assigning any of them to a wrong principle. ⁴ For as those works of wonder which exceeded or controlled all the powers of created nature, must be attributed to a principle omnipotent and divine; so in those others, which relate either to joy or sorrow, subjection or exultation, he must be understood to proceed upon a principle purely human, and that the faculties of the divine nature were in such cases, totally suspended.

Now it is certain, that the perfections of the divine nature will admit of neither any increase nor diminution of its power and greatness. The author to the Hebrews ⁵ applies to our Saviour Christ these words of the Psalmist, ⁶ 'Thou, O Lord, in the beginning, hast laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hand;' and surely he who created the world, and ⁷ 'without him not any thing was made, that was made,' could not fail of having, from all eternity, a sovereign power both in heaven and earth. It is not in respect of his divinity, therefore, that our Lord speaks of his enlargement of power, but of his human nature; which, in reward of his obedience and humiliation, ⁸ 'was highly exalted; and obtained of God a name, which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.'

It is equally certain, that the divine nature is not capable of any grief or sorrow, or other perturbation of mind arising from an apprehension of some imminent danger, or a sense of some incumbent calamity; and therefore when our Saviour complains of the vast load of sorrow that lay heavy upon his spirits, and almost quite sunk them down, this he must be supposed to say with regard to his human nature only, because his divine was exempt from all such suffering. But then the question is, from what particular cause it was, that all this sorrow and fear, and consternation of mind, for ^a so the original words import, could possibly arise?

⁹ Those who impute all this to nothing more than a natural dread of pain and death, have this difficulty to contend with, that how grievous soever these things may be, especially to sinful flesh and blood, yet they are such as have been corrected by reason, and in their most tremendous shapes, borne with great patience and resignation of mind; and therefore it can hardly be imagined, that the prospect of a crucifixion could have raised such commotions in a soul which had the testimony of a good conscience to support it, and a glorious reward set before it, to make a full recompense for what he suffered.

¹⁰ Others are of opinion, therefore, that this excessive sorrow and dejection of mind were occasioned by the perfect and penetrating light, which then diffused itself in our Saviour's mind all at once, concerning the guilt of sin, and the wrath of an incensed God; that the horror of these filled and amazed his vast apprehensive soul; and that these apprehensions could not but affect his tender heart, full of the highest zeal for God's glory, and the most relenting compassion for the souls of men; for, if the true contrition of one single sinner, ¹¹ say they, bleeding under the sting of the law, only for his own iniquities, cannot be performed, without great bitterness of sorrow and remorse, what bounds can be set to that grief, what measure to that anguish, which proceeded from a full apprehension of all the transgressions of so many millions of sinners?

¹² This is the most common solution: and yet there is something in the context which has induced others to think, that on this occasion, the devil and his angels had collected all their forces, in order to fill our Saviour's mind with the most dismal terrifying scenes of horror, thereby to divert him from his intended enterprise. For, 1st, we may observe that, before he entered the garden, where this agony seized him, he expected some terrible assault from these infernal powers, and therefore he tells his disciples, 'The prince of the world cometh,' ¹³ that is, is now mustering up his legions to make his last effort upon me; but this is my comfort, that he will find nothing in me, no sinful inclination to take part with

⁹ See Stillingfleet's sermons; Stanhope on the epistles and gospels, vol. ii. and his sermons on several occasions.

¹⁰ Pearson on the creed; and South's sermons, vol. iii.

¹¹ Ibid. ¹² Scott's Mediator. ¹³ Joh. xiv. 30.

^a The words in the original are three,—λυπίσθαι, ἐκταμβισθαι, and ἀδημονίην. The first λυπίσθαι is of a known and ordinary signification; but, in this case, it is to be raised to the highest degree of signification, as appears by the words which follow, περίλυτος ἐστὶν ἡ ψυχὴ μου ὡς θάνατος, Mat. xxvi. 38. So that it does not only signify the excess of sorrow, surrounding and encompassing the soul, but also such as brings a consternation and dejection of mind, bowing the soul under the pressures and burden of it. The second ἐκταμβισθαι, in the vulgar Latin, is pavere, but, according to the Greek idiom, bears a much stronger sense, and signifies indeed the highest degree of fear, horror, and amazement. The third ἀδημονίην denotes the consequences of excessive fear and sorrow, that is, anxiety of mind, disquietude and restlessness.—Pearson on the creed.

¹ John xvi. 30. ² Ibid. xv. 15. ³ Ibid. xvi. 12.

⁴ Stanhope's sermons on several occasions. ⁵ Heb. i. 10.

⁶ Psal. cii. 25. ⁷ Joh. i. 3. ⁸ Phil. ii. 9.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END

him, no guilty reflection to expose me to his tyranny. 2dly, That when the disciples entered the garden with our Lord, he gave them a strict charge, ¹ ‘to watch and pray, that they might not enter into temptation:’ which plainly implies, that, in that time and place, there was some occasion for a more than ordinary application to these duties; and this cannot so well be imputed to any thing else, as those numbers of evil spirits, who were going furiously to assault their Master, and would not altogether spare them. And, 3dly, that when the three elect apostles were a little advanced with him into the garden, he earnestly entreated them to watch with him; and yet we find them suddenly asleep, and no sooner awake, but asleep again, and again: for the text tells us,² ‘that their eyes were heavy;’ which prodigious drowsiness of theirs, upon so momentous an occasion, cannot be ascribed to any thing so well as to a preternatural stupefaction of their senses by some of these infernal spirits now conflicting with their Master, and who, perhaps, to deprive him of the solace of their company, did, by their diabolical arts, produce that extraordinary stupor which oppressed them, that so having him alone, they might have the greater advantage to tempt and terrify him.

These observations make it highly probable, that this his last agony was occasioned by a mighty struggle and conflict with the powers of darkness, ³ who having, by God’s permission, mustered up all their strength, intended once more to try their fortune against him, and to this purpose surrounding him, very probably, with a mighty host, exerted all their power and malice in persecuting his innocent soul; in distracting it with horrid phantasms; in afflicting it with dismal suggestions: in vexing and tormenting it with dire imaginations, and dreadful spectacles; and, in short, in practising all the arts and machinations that their malice and subtily could invent, to tempt and deter him if possible from his gracious design of redeeming mankind.

⁴ Had our Lord indeed, in this conflict, been assisted with any succour from his divinity, this would have set him far above the opposition of any created power; but, that the second Adam might make a reparation for the fall of the first, and, in that very nature, left to itself, and, unassisted by any foreign aid, vanquish the enemy that had given it so grievous a foil before, the divine perfections lay by, as it were, and forbore to engage: they withdrew their influence for that time, and suspending their operations, left him to encounter as man, though much more perfect than any other man.

Putting all these dismal and distracting things together then, the apprehension of a cruel and ignominious death, the sense of the guilt and heinous nature of sin, the prospect of God’s wrath, the combination of devils, and the suspension of the divine power and protection, we need not much wonder that we find our blessed Saviour in the garden complaining, that ‘his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death;’ or on the cross crying out, ‘My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?’ That we find him, in the midst of his agony, sweating out blood in great abundance; deprecating death with more vehemence than some heathen sages, and many Christian martyrs did; and when his spirits were thus depressed, his human nature quite exhausted, and no relief from the divine afforded him, that an angel should be sent from heaven to revive and strengthen him. For when the divinity, which resided in him, had either suspended or subtracted its influence, he, who, in respect of his manhood,⁵ was made a little while inferior to the angels, and, in respect of his sufferings, was now in a more distressed condition than ever man knew, being left to his human nature alone, could not but stand in need of the comfort and consolation of an angel.

All this while the divine nature of Christ, though it did not think fit to exert itself,⁶ was inseparably united to the human. Nor can we conceive why it should not still continue, even after death, in the same manner united; since no power has any force against omnipotence, nor could any finite agent work any alteration in that union. To understand the nature of this union, we must observe,⁷ that in the person of Christ, after the assumption of our nature, there were two different substantial unions; one, of the two parts of his humanity, his soul and body, whereby he was truly man: and the other, of his divine and human nature, whereby he was both God and man in one person: and that, though at his death the constituent parts of him as man, that is, his human soul and body, were parted, and so continued for some time, yet the union of his two natures still remained; ^a death made no alteration in that, nor were his soul and body ever separated from the Godhead, but, as the divine nature still subsisted, they still continued in conjunction with it: upon which account, as we are taught to believe, that God redeemed us with his blood, so has it been the constant language of the church, that ‘God died for us,’ which in no sense could be true, unless our blessed Saviour’s soul and body, in the instant of separation, and until their conjunction again, were united to the Deity. And therefore, when we hear him crying upon the cross,⁸ ‘My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?’ he means the same thing as when he calls upon us to ⁹ ‘behold and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow.’ For from these words we can infer nothing more than this,—that he was then bereft of such joys and comforts as he expected from the Deity, to assuage and mitigate the acerbity of the torments he was under. The truth is, what seems to solve all difficulties best, is the ancient notion of the Godhead’s being quiescent, and not exerting its power and efficacy in such instances, where the humanity is known to have suffered. In this manner it confessedly withdrew at his death; otherwise we cannot see how he could have died at all; and in this manner, by parity of reason, it might continue its

⁵ Heb. ii. 7. ⁶ Pearson on the Creed, art. iv. ⁷ Ibid.

⁸ Mat. xxvii. 46.

⁹ Lam. i. 12.

^a The words of St Austin are very full and excellent to this purpose. “Wherefore the Word became flesh, that he might dwell among us, and from the Word was he formed man, namely, a whole man, soul and body. What did his sultering do, what did his death do, unless the separating of his body from his soul? It did not separate his soul from the Word; for though the Lord died, (undoubtedly his flesh died,) but his soul, I affirm, was not separated from the Word; the soul only left the body for a short time, to rise again with returning animation. To the soul of the robber he said, ‘To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise.’ He did not leave the faithful soul of the robber, and did he leave his own? Forbid it; as he had such care for the thief’s soul, his own he must inseparably have retained.”—Tract on John; 47.

¹ Mat. xxvi. 41. ² Mat. xxvi. 43. ³ Scot’s Mediator.

⁴ Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. ii.

A. M. 4027. A. D. 33; OR. A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

quiescence during the whole space of his interment, and until its power and operation were requisite, in order to effect his resurrection.

As our blessed Saviour then was both God and man in one person, and the efficacy and mystery of man's redemption consisted in this union,¹ it was necessary that there should be a clear and undoubted demonstration given of the reality of both these natures. But, since the distinguishing marks of human nature lie chiefly in the soul, there had not been that demonstration given of our Saviour's perfect humanity, unless he had discovered, in his conduct, an exact resemblance to us, in all the natural passions and inclinations of our souls. Now, in this soul of ours there is a twofold principle, sense and reason. Sense catches at the present, pursues ease and safety, and industriously consults the preservation and advantage of the body; whereas reason enlarges our prospect, takes into consideration distant and future objects, and persuades the foregoing of some satisfactions, the running of some hazards, and enduring of some difficulties in the discharge of our duty, and the expectation of a greater good in reversion. Under the former of these are comprehended all our natural passions, which are the secret springs that move us to what we do: under the latter are the understanding and judgment, which direct, and regulate, and bound, and over-rule these passions. But still both these are constituent parts, and as necessary to make a perfect soul, as the rational soul and human body are to make one perfect man; and from hence it follows, that the weakness and corruption of our nature, as it stands depraved by sin, does not consist in our being tenderly touched with the fear of present evil, or the desire of present good, but only in suffering these fears and desires to prevail, and take place, against the dictates of reason and duty.

Aversion to pain and conflict, to sorrow and death, and whatever is shocking and frightful to human nature, are affections interwoven with our original frame and constitution. Adam, in his state of innocence, felt them; and therefore it is no just reflection upon the second Adam, that he, in like manner, felt them too. Infirmities indeed these aversions may be called, in comparison of those perfections which belong to God, and unbodied spirits; but then they are such infirmities as all who partake of bodies, must have, and which if our Saviour had been destitute of, he could not have been truly man.

Now, if Christ, as man, could not be altogether indifferent and unconcerned at such severe trials, as the imposition of the burden of our sins, the infliction of pain and torment, his approaching conflict with the powers of darkness, and the utter subduction of all divine aid and assistance, must necessarily bring upon him; then surely it could not misbecome him to use all possible means for declining them, and consequently to express his concern, by praying against them, but with this modest reserve and limitation, ² 'Nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done.' For it was no disparagement either of his obedience to God, or love to mankind, that he had an aversion to death, and pain, and sufferings; but, in truth, an higher commendation to both; since notwithstanding so tender a sense of what he was to suffer, he offered himself to undergo whatever God, for their benefit and salvation, should think proper to lay upon him. So that the more passionate his wishes were for a release, the more meritorious was his submission; and the stronger his aversions were, the more was the resignation of his own will; and, consequently, the more acceptable was his compliance with that of his heavenly Father.

His heavenly Father, no doubt, could³ have exempted mankind from punishment, without an equivalent compensation for their guilt. As an all-wise being, he could have invented many methods of salvation, without the sacrifice of his beloved Son; and as a supreme lawgiver, he might have extended mercy to whom, and upon what terms he thought fit; but then, as he was the supreme lawgiver, and governor of the world, it was consistent with his justice, and his infinite wisdom, we may say, required it of him, to vindicate the authority of his laws, and see sin punished in such an exemplary manner, as to deter, if possible, his subjects from it for the future.

Now this was the state and condition of mankind, when God's infinite wisdom contrived the scheme of their redemption. They had alienated themselves from him; were under sin, under condemnation, under the curse of the law, under the sentence of death. In this condition, however, they were not to be left to perish; God's infinite goodness would not permit that: but then, how to accomplish their recovery, and preserve his attributes inviolate, this was the difficulty. For how, in consistence with the glory, and justice, and sanctity of God, could such enemies be reconciled, and such offenders pardoned? Would omnipotent majesty think of any treaty, without an advocate and intercessor? Would the sovereign ruler of the world suffer his honour to be slighted, without a proper vindication? Would the great patron of justice relax the terms of it, and permit wickedness to pass unpunished? Would the God of truth reverse his decree, and stop the sentence of death from falling upon sinners? Or would the God of righteousness omit any opportunity of expressing the love he bore to innocence, and abhorrence to iniquity? How then could we well be cleared from our guilt, without an expiation; or reinstated in freedom without a ransom; or exempted from condemnation, without some vicarious punishment? No, God was pleased so to prosecute his designs of goodness and mercy, as not in the least to impair or obscure it, but rather advance and illustrate the glories of his sovereign dignity, of his severe justice, of his immaculate holiness, and immutability both in word and purpose.

He was willing to listen to a treaty, but from the mouth of no mediator but such as was of equal dignity with himself. He was willing to remit the punishment due to our sins, but not without a sacrifice that would make full atonement for them. He was willing to give us back our lives again, but not without a substitution of another life equivalent to them all. But now, how could these things be done? Where could we find a mediator, proper and worthy to intercede for us, and to negotiate a new covenant, whereby God might be satisfied and we saved? Who could offer for us a sacri-

¹ Stanhope's Sermons on several occasions. ² Luke xxii. 42.

³ Stanhope's Sermons on several occasions.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

tice of value sufficient to atone for sins so vastly numerous, and all committed against infinite majesty? Or who could undertake for the everlasting redemption of all the souls, since the first creation, and lay down a competent price for them? Nothing on earth, nothing in heaven, was found able to do this.

Man, the most innocent and upright man, could by no means redeem his brother, or give to God a ransom for him. Angels have obligations enough of their own to discharge, and cannot be solvent for any more than the debt of their own gratitude and praise. The brightest of that heavenly host cannot, over and above this, make compensation for one human sin; but, for the sins of the whole world united, there was no propitiation to be found, until the Son of God offered himself, and was accepted by the Father. Our humanity he assumed, to enable him to suffer, and interest us in what he did; but the divinity, which he had with the Father from the beginning, this he brought with him, to derive an infinite value upon his sufferings, and to make the ransom and oblation which he paid down for us a full satisfaction for sins innumerable, and infinitely heinous.

In the expiation of these sins, we own, that the punishment which our Saviour submitted to, was but temporal, whereas that to which sinners are obnoxious, is eternal; but for that several good reasons may be alleged. The author to the Hebrews, in his comparison between the Levitical and Christian dispensations, tells us, that 'such a high priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and who needeth not daily, as the high priests under the law, to offer up sacrifices, first for his own sins and then for those of the people.' So that what qualified him to offer a sacrifice for the sins of mankind, was his perfect innocence; for had he been, in any degree a sinner himself, he must have suffered for his own offences; and consequently, been incapable of effecting an expiation for ours.

² Now, if our blessed Saviour was entirely innocent and holy, it was impossible that he should suffer the same punishments, which by the just decree of God, are due to wilful and impenitent sinners. ³ He could not do it in his body; for that could only die by what he suffered on the cross; and he could not do it in his soul; for how could that soul, which knew no sin, be under a remorse of conscience for any thing that he had done? How could he, ⁴ 'who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross,' lie under any sense of God's unchangeable displeasure? or he, who knew that ⁵ his soul should not be left in Hades, nor his body see corruption, be seized with an absolute despair of any better state, or an uneasy apprehension of no release from what he was to suffer? The punishments of the damned are without end, and without hope; but everlasting misery and despair could never be consistent with the condition of one who had not deserved them, and whose innocence secured and preserved him from them. These are the consequences of sin and rebellion against God; but the sufferings of Jesus, were the greatest proof of an entire obedience in the most difficult instance of submission, and so far from incurring the divine displeasure, that, from this very cause ⁶ God hath highly exalted him.

But though, from the nature and reason of the thing, it appears that our Lord neither did, nor could suffer such punishments, in kind and measure, as were due to sinners; yet it must be observed, that he underwent such things as bore some analogy to what sinners are to suffer, and what he would not have suffered had he not been punished for our transgressions.

⁷ For whereas sinners lie under the sentence of condemnation, and are sure to find a public exemplary judgment; so was our Saviour solemnly condemned and sentenced as a malefactor, a seditious person, a perverter of the nation, a rebel against Caesar, and a blasphemer against God. Whereas sinners will be exposed to shame and ignominy, at the great day of judgment, before men and angels; so our Lord suffered a very shameful and ignominious death, and that attended with all the mockeries, affronts, and obloquies, that the malice of his enemies could cast upon him. And whereas sinners are obnoxious to very grievous torments both of body and soul, and these inflicted by the hand of an enraged God; so, in his person, our Lord suffered death painful to such a degree, as to make the most exquisite tortures be called *cruciatu*s. from the cross; and, in his mind, such a load of grief and anguish, as might well justify the mournful complaint of the prophet, ⁸ 'all ye that pass by, behold, and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger.'

Now, from this fair resemblance between what our Lord actually suffered, and what sinners had deserved to suffer, there seems to be sufficient ground to say, that he bore the punishment of our iniquities, and suffered in our stead; though what he underwent was not, in every point, the same that we, had it not been for his interposition, must have been obliged to suffer.

⁹ All that was requisite indeed in his sufferings was, that the injuries and affronts offered to the divine justice by the provocation of wicked men, should receive a sufficient compensation; that the honour of God and his laws should be vindicated, and sin made as terrible and full of discouragement, as it could possibly be; though no such method of mercy had ever been devised. Now all these ends were fully satisfied by the Son of God condescending to suffer in our stead; and, if there was any thing wanting in the duration or extremity of his sufferings, that was abundantly made up by the dignity of the person, who, through the eternal spirit, that is, the divine united to our human nature, ¹⁰ 'offered himself without spot to God,' and in virtue of that union, exalted the value of his oblation to an infinite degree, and paid a ransom to offended justice of more worth than an hundred thousand worlds.

But how great soever the benefit was which accrued to mankind from the death of our Saviour Christ, there is no apologizing for those that were the bloody instruments of it, and least of all for Judas. For, besides the aggravation of his being a disciple, a friend, a constant companion, one that had been taught and sustained by him, and not only an hearer of his doctrine, and an eye-witness of his miracles, but, in virtue of the commission received from him, a preacher of the gospel, and a worker of miracles himself; besides all this, I say, it is evident, that his wickedness was not the effect of a sudden surprise, or want of recollection, but the work of deliberation, and long contrivance, and solemn debate. For he consulted with the high-priests and elders concerning the time, the place, and every circumstance, for the most convenient execution of his villany. After such consultation, he continued his attendance upon his master, that, under the disguise of friendship, and by much laboured hypocrisy, he might better carry on his design to destroy him: and as his design was advancing to maturity, he had all along had broad hints and monitions given him, that his plot was discovered, and many warnings of the sin and danger he was running into; but none of these altered his purpose. So that, in this act of his, there is a complication of ingratitude and perfidy, hypocrisy and malice, and a settled inflexible resolution to do wickedly, beyond the power of advice and warning, and the most awful menaces to control it: and this might be some reason why his repentance met not with success, as it is evident it did not, from our Lord's calling him ¹ 'the son of perdition,' and declaring, that ² 'it had been better for him if he had never been born.'

¹ Heb. vii. 26, 27. ² Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. ii. ³ Whitby's appendix to Mat. xxvi. ⁴ Heb. xii. 2. ⁵ Psal. xvi. 10.

⁶ Phil. ii. 9. ⁷ Whitby's appendix to Mat. xvi. ⁸ Lam. i. 12. ⁹ Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. ii. ¹⁰ Heb. ix. 14.

A. M. 4037 A. D. 33; OR. A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

³ The evangelists indeed tell us, ⁴ 'that he repented himself;' but then it is evident, that by repenting is not every where intended a change of heart and life; nor the whole of that which repentance strictly signifies, when made the condition of pardon and salvation, but only some part and imperfect degree of it. Judas found that matters were grown to so desperate an height, that there was no probable appearances of his Master's escaping the malice of the Jews; and recollected, very likely, the predictions of our Lord concerning the dreadful vengeance which should overtake the person that betrayed him to death. These, and probably many other dreadful reflections, working together with all that confusion which fear and guilt are known to create in men's minds, seem to have made up that concern which the text hath expressed by 'repenting himself;' a concern resulting from a principle of self-preservation, in the most carnal sense of the word. But we find not in him any due sense of the villany of the fact, nor any condemning himself, as the basest, most ungrateful, the most abandoned wretch alive; one that had violated the laws of God, and society, and nature, and cast all fidelity and gratitude, and common humanity behind his back. All which, and a great deal more, were not only aggravations due to his crime, but the very properest occasions of remorse.

He felt indeed some regret for what he had done, as an awakened conscience cannot fence off such reflections, and he wished perhaps he had never done it; but the regret which he felt, seems rather to have been the effect of confusion and rage, than any godly relenting; the agonies of frenzy, and amazement, and despair; which are the most distant things in the world from that sober and regular sorrow, ⁵ 'which worketh repentance unto salvation, not to be repented of.'

Herein then lay the defect of Judas's repentance, that the horror of his sin led him into despair. For repentance, we must know, does not barely consist in sorrow for sin, but in such a sorrow as is tempered and supported with hope; not in a mere confession of our transgressions, but in such a confession as trusts and depends on forgiveness; and, as it imports a change of manners, unless we are first persuaded that our sincere endeavours for the future will be kindly received, and our former transgressions generously passed over, all ground and encouragement for such a change is utterly taken away.

Reason indeed cannot lead us to infer, that sorrow for the past, or amendment for the time to come, can be any equivalent satisfaction for our offences; but revelation assures us, that God may be appeased, and it hath told us withal in what manner he is appeased, even by the precious blood of his Son, 'who came to give his life a ransom for many.' In this matter God hath declared himself so fully, that the very heinousness of our sins is not a greater provocation, than the distrust of mercy, which, in effect, is making God a liar, and disparaging the merits of Christ's sacrifice, after we have committed them. So that hope of mercy, and faith in the promises, and satisfaction of Christ, are the very life and spirit of true repentance, essential and indispensably requisite to quicken and recommend every part of it: and therefore no wonder if Judas's repentance proved so ineffectual, which was plainly destitute of these necessary qualifications.

If it be inquired, how Judas came to be wanting in this point? The immediate cause, no question, was, that God had forsaken him, and withdrawn his grace from him. But then if we pursue this inquiry still farther, and drive it up to its true fountain-head, the matter will fall upon Judas himself, as the proper and original cause of his own misery and destruction.

For, whatever we may think of the doctrine of predestination, it is certain that the miserable Judas was not aware of any power in it to sustain his mind, when he came to reflect on what he had done. He could not interpret, that the foreknowledge of God had any causality or influence upon his sins, because he found cause enough for that arising from his own deportment: ⁶ for, having given way to a covetous desire, and hardened his heart by a sinful indulgence of it against all impressions of wholesome counsel, he was convinced that the prophecy of his treason could not fail of its event; because, when the temptation offered he could not choose but do what he did. He had indeed lost all his power and liberty to do better, though still the necessity which he then lay under, was not fatal, but natural; not of God's decreeing, but of his own procuring. Under these juster apprehensions of his crime, he is said to have repented, in the worst sense of the words; that is, he grieved, he despaired, and then he hanged himself. And though we allow that his passions transported him too extravagantly in these latter violences, yet even from what was rational in his grief, we may learn this lesson,—'That when an awakened conscience comes to estimate the nature of its guilt, there will be found but poor shelter in all these palliations that can be formed by human subtilty, and licentious wit.'

¹ John xvii. 12.

² Mat. xxvi. 24.

³ Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. ii.

⁴ Mat. xxvii. 3.

⁵ Cor. vii. 10.

⁶ Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

The aggravations of St Peter's offence in denying our Lord, are much of the same kind with that of Judas in betraying him. That a person, who for the space of three years and more, had the honour of our Lord's conversation, the conviction of his miracles, and the instruction of his doctrine; who had been let into the knowledge of those mysteries, which, for wise reasons, were delivered in parables, and concealed from others; admitted to his transfiguration upon the mount, his converse with Moses and Elias, and to hear that voice from God's excellent glory, 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased,'¹ as himself testifies; that a person, who hereupon had made confession of his Master's divinity, and received his commendations for it; had been chosen a companion of his agonies, and forewarned frequently of the great danger of denying him; and hereupon grown so very resolute, that he offered² to go with him into prison, and to death, and, to distinguish himself above any of his brethren,³ 'Though all should be offended,' says he, 'because of thee, yet will not I be offended; and though I were to die with thee, yet would not I deny thee:' that a person, I say, placed in this rank and elevation, should fall off in the time of trial, should deny and abjure his Master, whose greatest honour it was to own, implies a guilt still more heinous, the more his knowledge and former conviction, the more his warning and long experience, the more his professions and boasted firmness of mind were conspicuous.

This however may be said with relation to the difference between the crime of Judas and that of St Peter, that the former proceeded from a spirit of malice, and fixed resolution to do evil, occasioned by a sordid and covetous temper; that it was nourished up by long contrivance and deliberation, was carried on by hypocrisy and deep dissimulation, was executed with perfidy and great violence, and ended, at last, in the agonies of horror and despair; whereas St Peter's crime, though a very great one, was but of short continuance, and never in his intention at first; was indeed the effect of fear and human infirmity, occasioned, in a great measure, by surprise and want of recollection; not so much the act of the man, as it was the force of the temptation he was under; and therefore when he⁴ came to remember the words which Jesus had said unto him, and thereupon to consider how shamefully he had fallen from his courage and constancy, how easily he had been betrayed into a crime he thought himself not capable of, how base he had been to so kind a Master, how false to his promises, how regardless of truth, how peremptory in a most notorious falsehood, and how profane and profligate in his oaths and curses; when he came to consider all this, I say, a godly sorrow swelled his heart, and tears gushed out of his eyes; 'He went out and wept bitterly.'

Judas, in like manner, might weep for his transgression perhaps; but his tears must have been ineffectual, because the season of that grace which he had long resisted and defeated, was departed from him, and God provoked to give him over to his own perverseness; whereas our Saviour, who foresaw from what principle St Peter's offence would arise, and how sudden his conversion would be,⁵ 'had prayed for him, that his faith might not fail,' and thence his recovery did proceed. We should be injurious however to the memory of this apostle, if we should here neglect to relate how his after behaviour showed the sincerity of his repentance, and made an ample amends for the scandal of his offence.

⁶ It was this same St Peter, who, after our Lord's resurrection, returned to the fervour of affection for which he was remarkable before; that so exerted himself at the day of⁷ Pentecost, and proved, by irrefragable arguments, 'that Jesus Christ was the Son of God;' and maintained his point against the Jewish rulers,⁸ despising their rebukes and angry menaces, and telling them plainly,⁹ that God was to be obeyed rather than man; that confirmed his brethren by his resolute behaviour, and¹⁰ made it a matter of rejoicing, that he was accounted worthy to suffer shame for the once abjured name of Christ. In a word, it was he who, after a long labour of preaching, and persecutions of all kinds, at length finished his course, and glorified God by the same sort of death that his blessed Son condescended to undergo for our sakes. So that St Peter was not more different from himself, when trembling at the voice of a silly damsel, than the same St Peter afterwards, the glorious and invincible apostle, before the council, in prison, and upon the cross, was from the cowardly and infamous renegade in the high-priest's palace. This settled and deliberate fidelity was a noble compensation for the infirmity and transports of this fall. This showed what the man was when perfectly himself, and supported by the grace of God, as the other did what he was when naked, and destitute of heavenly succours, depending upon his own strength, and left in the hand of his own passions.

St Paul¹¹ represents our Saviour as 'a merciful high-priest because he was touched with a feeling of our infirmities;' and as it is natural for us to compassionate those that are in the same state of misery with ourselves, so might our Lord, from the society of suffering, have been induced, at this time, to admit the penitent upon the cross into a participation of bliss, who at another time, would not have met with so ready a reception.¹² It might therefore be no small advantage to the penitent thief, that he happened to die in company with Christ, though it is certain, that the good disposition which he discovered in his behaviour and confession, was enough to recommend him to the divine mercy.

It is highly probable, that this man never knew anything of Jesus before, otherwise than by common fame; nay, that he was prepossessed against him as an impostor, and joined with his companion in reviling him at first; and therefore the greater was his virtue in overcoming these prejudices so soon, and in suffering the meekness and patience, the charity and piety, of our Lord's miraculous death to disabuse him. This is so far from making him a late penitent, that it gives him the glory of an early convert; one whose heart was open to the first impression of grace, and wanted not so much the inclination as the opportunity, of embracing the truth before.

But admitting that he had seen and heard of Christ before; yet, that he should now come in to the acknowledgment of him, and believe him to be the Saviour of the world, when one of his disciples had betrayed another

¹ 2 Pet. i. 17, 18.

² Luke xxli. 33.

³ Mat. xxvi. 35.

⁴ Mat. xxvi. 75.

⁵ Luke xxii. 32.

⁶ Stanhope's sermons on several occasions.

⁷ Acts ii. 14.

⁸ Ibid. iv. 19, 20.

⁹ Ibid. v. 29.

¹⁰ Ibid. ver. 41.

¹¹ Heb. iv. 15.

¹² Taylor's Life of Christ.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROMMAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

had denied, and all of them had forsaken him; and to be the Son of God, and Lord of Life, when he was hanging upon the cross, suffering the pangs of death, and seemingly deserted by his Father: that he should take sanctuary in a dying and universally despised man, publish his innocence in the face of triumphant malice, and, through the thickest cloud of shame and suffering that ever intercepted the glories of the Son of God, discover his divine power, acknowledge his celestial kingdom, throw himself upon his protection, and call upon him, as the great disposer of rewards and happiness after death; this was a confession so resolute, so singular, so illustrious, as never was undergone, as never can in all respects, be equalled, except the same Jesus were again to be crucified. For no man's conversion ever had, ever can have, upon other terms, such disadvantageous and discouraging circumstances, as this man laboured under, and yet so generously overcame.

Well therefore might ¹ St Chrysostom, as he does with great force and eloquence, rebuke the impudence of those late penitents, who presume to take sanctuary in this example; for what affinity, what shadow of resemblance is there, between a man submitting to the first impression, and accepting of offers as soon as made; and one who has lived under the ministry of the gospel, and enjoyed both the outward calls of God's word, and the inward solicitations of his Spirit, but turned the deaf ear continually to both? between a man who to our Lord paid the highest degree of homage and respect, even when he had made himself of no reputation, and appeared in the guise of the vilest malefactor; and one who, notwithstanding his resurrection from the dead, and exaltation to glory, notwithstanding the conquest made by the gospel, and the infamy of denying him now, continues still to injure and affront, to despise and defy him, in his most prosperous and triumphant condition?

In a word, no Christian, who hath lived under the dispensation of the gospel, can, at the end of his days, plead the same ready compliance to the calls of grace, and no man whatever can have the opportunity of exerting the same vigorous faith, because Christ could die but once, and it was his shame and suffering alone that made the confession of this penitent so peculiarly glorious, and such as the whole series of a pious life in other men can hardly parallel. So that if we are allowed to make any use, or to draw any consolation from this example, it can be no more than this,—that repentance, when true, is never too late, and therefore the thief upon the cross, is a sovereign antidote against despair. But men may out-stay the day of grace: they may not go about the work until it is too late; until they have lost both the will and the power to repent; and therefore this example, when truly considered, is an excellent preservative likewise against presumption. ^a

It may be deemed perhaps some mistake in the evangelist, or rather a disparagement to the Holy Spirit, by whose direction, we say, it was he wrote, that St Matthew cites Jeremiah for a passage, which no where occurs but in the Prophet Zechariah; but then it should be proved that St Matthew does actually cite Jeremiah. ² In most of the Latin and Greek copies indeed, we have the word Jeremiah at present, but it is much to be questioned whether it was in the original, since the Syriac and Persic versions mention no name, but barely the prophets, and those copies, in ³ St Austin's opinion, are most to be relied on, which have not the name of Jeremiah inserted in them, because this might possibly proceed from the ignorance or carelessness of some transcriber. ⁴ Some of our modern reconcilers have another way of accounting for this. They endeavour to prove, ⁵ from the writings of the Jewish Rabbins, that both before, under, and after the second temple, the order of the sacred books were several times transposed, and that, in the time when St Matthew wrote his gospel, the book of Jeremiah, as does now that of Isaiah, stood first in the volume of prophets, and so became the running title of all the rest. For, that the first book in a volume may give the name to the rest, is obvious, say they, from the words of our Saviour's telling his disciples, that ⁶ 'all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning him:' where, by the word Psalms, he means all the Hagiography, consisting of hymns to God, and documents of life; and are all so called, because in that part of the division of the Old Testament, they had obtained the first place.

But as there are no words cited in the like manner from any other prophet in the whole New Testament, ⁷ others have imagined, that the passage which St Matthew quotes, was originally in the authentic copies of Jeremiah, but that, by the malice of the Jews, it was erased, because it was looked upon as too plain a prophecy for this circumstance of our Saviour's life; or rather, that it was recorded in a certain apocryphal book of Jeremiah's, from whence St Matthew took it. That there was such a book extant, is evident from the testimony of St Jerome, ⁸ who expressly tells us, that he read the very words here quoted in an Hebrew volume communicated to him by a Jew of the Nazarene sect. And, that it was no disparagement to cite an apocryphal book, is manifest from the practice of the apostles, who made mention ⁹ of James and Jambres, though they no where occur in the canonical Scripture; who quote ¹⁰ the prophecy of Enoch, though generally reputed an apocryphal book; nay, and produce the sayings of Aratus, ¹¹ Epimenides, ¹² and Euripides, ¹³ though these were profane heathen authors: for though such books, say they, were not received into the canon, yet they might nevertheless contain such truths as were worthy of belief.

Those, however, who have compared the writings of

¹ Tom. 5. orat. 7.

^a The account of the pardoned criminal is related by one evangelist only, as if the Holy Spirit foresaw the perversion of the passage. One instance only, to use the language of a celebrated divine, of the acceptance of a dying repentance is recorded; one only that none might despair, and one only that none might presume.—Townsend's Harmony.—Ed.

² Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part ii. ³ De content. evan. tom. 4. b. iii. c. 7. ⁴ Lightfoot in loc. and Surenhusius, in conciliat. in loc. et Vet. Test. apud Mat. ⁵ In cod. Talmud. Bava Batra, fol. 14. col. 2. ⁶ Luke xxvi. 44.

⁷ See Calmet's Commentary, Whitty's Annotations, and Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part ii. ⁸ In Mat. xxvi. 9. ⁹ 2 Tim. iii. 8. ¹⁰ Jude, ver. 14. ¹¹ Acts xvii. 28. ¹² Tit. i. 12. ¹³ 1 Cor. xv. 33.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

these two prophets together, have observed, that Zechariah was so close an imitator of Jeremiah, as to give just occasion for the saying of the Jews, namely, That the spirit of Jeremy had passed into Zechary, and so both together made but one prophet: and from hence others have concluded, that the 9th, 10th, and 11th chapters of Zechariah were not wrote by him, but by Jeremiah, though, at present, they go under the other's name. The book of Psalms, we know, though the whole collection be called David's, contains many pieces that were not of his composition. In that of Proverbs, there are several wise sentences, besides those of Solomon, ascribed to ¹ Agar, the son of Jakeh, and to ² the mother of King Lemuel; and, by parity of reason, these chapters of Zechariah might originally have been written by the prophet Jeremiah, though, in process of time, they happened to creep in among the verses of his great imitator.

And indeed, whoever looks into the contents of these chapters will soon perceive, that such things are related in them, are as inconsistent with the time wherein Zechariah lived, but very well agree with that of Jeremiah: that what he says, for instance,³ of the pride of Assyria being brought down, and the sceptre of Egypt being departed, could not be foretold by him, because these events were then passed and gone, but might very well be predicted by Jeremiah; that what he says ⁴ of Gaza, and Ashkelon, as cities then in being, could not be recorded of them, forasmuch as these places were destroyed long before his days, but might properly enough be mentioned by Jeremiah, because in his time they were subsisting; and that the earthquake ⁵ which he alludes to, in the days of Uzziah, was of too distant a date to be remembered in his time, though it is not unlikely that tradition might have transmitted the report of it down as far as the days of Jeremiah. If then there be found in Zechariah things inconsistent with his time, but such as comported very well with the period wherein Jeremiah lived, it is natural to think, that though the whole book went under another's name, yet still such parts of it as contained these things, must have been wrote by a person with whom they were coincident; and that therefore St Matthew is so far from committing any blunder, that he makes a very valuable discovery, in ascribing the prophecy now before us to its proper author.

Thus, take it which way we will, we cannot justly accuse the evangelist of any misquotation: and much less can we charge him with any misrepresentation of a matter of fact, in his making our blessed Lord able enough to drive all the buyers and sellers out of the temple. St Jerom ⁶ indeed reckons this one of the greatest miracles that ever our Saviour did; and imputes his ability to do it to a certain divine majesty, which, at that time, appeared in his looks, and struck the company with such reverential awe and respect to his person, as restrained them from making any opposition: but, without having any recourse to any thing miraculous in this transaction, we need only remember, that our Lord was just now come up from Bethany to Jerusalem in a sort of royal and triumphant procession; that he was attended on the road, and into the city, with ⁷ a very great multitude, nay, with multitudes, that went before, and followed after; that these all went along with him into the temple, and proclaimed, as they had done on the road, 'Hosanna to the son of David;' and that the concourse, in short, was so great, that ⁸ all the city was moved, and even the chief priests were afraid of him, and of the people too, because they took him for a prophet, and ⁹ were attentive to hear him.

Now it is no hard matter to imagine, that the people, seeing our Saviour proceed to the temple in this triumphant manner, might seasonably enough call to mind the prediction of the prophet Malachi, ¹⁰ 'The Lord whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple: even the messenger of the covenant, in whom ye delight: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, that they may offer to the Lord an offering of righteousness;' and that, from the remembrance of this prophecy, they might be encouraged to abet his reformation of the temple. ¹¹ Nor is it to be doubted, that a consciousness of guilt in the profaners themselves might, in some measure, contribute to their submission and acquiescence, even in the same manner as his enemies were struck backwards with the sense of their own guilt, as well as the majesty of his appearance, and fell to the ground, when they came to apprehend him in the garden. So that, upon the whole, we are to consider our Saviour in this action, not in the form of a despised man, but of a triumphant monarch rather, at the head of an infinite number of people, all rejoicing in the completion of an ancient prophecy, all acknowledging him for their Messiah and king, and thereupon all ready to support him in any reformation that he should think proper to attempt.

The like is to be said of the relation which the evangelists give us of the darkness which happened at our Lord's crucifixion; that it is far from being a misrepresentation of the matter of fact, since we have it confirmed ¹² by the testimony of Phlegon, who, in the 40th book of his Chronicles, tells us, that in the 4th year of the CCIId Olympiad, which answers exactly to that of our Lord's death, "there was the greatest eclipse of the sun that had ever been before, insomuch that at noon-day the stars were seen in the sky;" ¹³ by the authority of Thallus, ¹⁴ a Greek historian, who, in his third book, speaks of the darkness that accompanied our Saviour's death, and which he, in like manner, called an eclipse; by the appeal which Tertullian, ¹⁵ and others make to the Roman archives, where the account that Pilate sent to Tiberius, of the miracles which happened at our Lord's passion, was deposited, for the truth of this prodigious darkness; and, ¹⁶ lastly, by the general consent of all Christian authors, for the space of the first six centuries, who, in treating this subject, have constantly made mention of this testimony of Phlegon and Thallus, together with this appeal to the Roman records, without the least hesitation, or diffidence of their truth: so that the only difficulty is, to know by what means this strange phenomenon was effected.

Phlegon and Thallus indeed, as they are cited ¹⁶ by Christian writers, seem to make this darkness a common ⁸ Mat. xxi. 10. ⁹ Luke xix. 48. ¹⁰ Mal. iii. 1. &c.

¹¹ Bishop Smallbrooke's Vindication, p. 136.

¹² Vid. Orig. cont. Cels. b. ii. ¹³ African. Chronogr.

¹⁴ Apolog. c. 21. ¹⁵ Whiston's Testimony of Phlegon vindicated.

¹⁶ Cabnet's Dissert. sur Les Tenebres.

¹ Prov. xxx. 1.

² Ibid. xxxi. 1.

³ Zech. x. 11.

⁴ Ibid. ix. 5.

⁵ Ibid. xiv. 5.

⁶ In Mat. xxi. 12.

⁷ Ibid. ver. 8, 9.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

eclipse, occasioned as others are, by an interposition of the moon between the sun and the earth; and thence some have inferred, that there was nothing extraordinary in it. But as it is a thing very well known, that the passover, when our Lord suffered, was always appointed at the full of the moon, and a thing naturally impossible, that an eclipse should happen when the moon is in this condition, we have reason to think, that this was an hasty conclusion which these two authors made, without ever bethinking themselves of the rules of astronomy; that finding, in the public records of the time of Tiberius, an account of a prodigious darkness which at noon-day made the stars appear in the firmament, this they suppose could have been effected only by an eclipse of the sun, and, upon such supposition, affirmed that it was so. But, for one circumstance unwarily advanced, it were madness to reject their testimony, which in other respects, exactly agrees with the account of the sacred writings.^a

Others, by the manner of their expression, seem to imply, that the sun, upon this occasion, withheld its rays, and, as it were, eclipsed itself, by restraining its lustre from issuing forth; never considering, that light in the sun is no accidental thing, nor any quality which it can suppress, or exert as it thinks proper. To shine is as necessary to it, as is its being: nor can its rays meet with any obstruction, but when some opaque body or other intervenes between us and them; and therefore, when the fathers in conformity to the style of the Scripture, say, that the sun or the stars withdrew their shining, this must be looked upon as a figurative and popular manner of expression, which seems to give these celestial bodies a kind of free action, thereby to make us more sensible of the absence or suspension of their effects.

Others therefore, with more probability, think, that as the sacred history says nothing of the sun, this darkness, which it takes notice of, was occasioned by a great number of condensed clouds, which gathering in the air, intercepted the light of the sun, and, for the space of three hours, produced the same effect that once happened in the land of Egypt, a darkness that might be felt. This hypothesis makes the matter very easy, but placing the whole miracle in the quick formation of the clouds at such a point of time, and the speedy dispersion of them after such a continuance, ^b only we must suppose, that ¹ by the whole earth, which the evangelist tells us was covered with this darkness, we are to understand the land of Judea only, in which sense the phrase does not unfrequently occur in Scripture.

¹ Ἐπὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, Mat. xxvii. 45.

^a See note on this subject, p. 189.—ED.

^b This is a very unphilosophical solution of the difficulty, if indeed there be any difficulty in the case, and such as cannot be admitted by common sense. If the rays of the sun were intercepted merely by a congeries of dense clouds, how came the feebler rays of the stars to penetrate those clouds which were impervious to the rays of the sun? The darkness was unquestionably miraculous, of which therefore no other account is to be given than that it was produced by the immediate interposition of God, as all other miracles have been; but what is now known of the constitution of the sun, renders it unnecessary to imagine either that masses of dense clouds, which indeed would not have answered the purpose, were interposed between the land of Judea and the sun; or that the moon was carried out of her course, and then rendered stationary for three hours in order to cause this preternatural darkness. If the sun be such a body as some philosophers seem to have lately ascertained it to be, the darkness might be produced, and produced over all the earth, merely by an aperture of the luminous atmosphere made much larger than those which are now known to produce the dark spots observed occasionally in the surface of the sun.—Bishop Gluy.—ED.

And indeed,² as the other wonderful things which came to pass at our Saviour's passion, such as the trembling of the earth, the rending of the rocks, the opening the graves, and tearing the veil of the temple, were transacted at Jerusalem, or at most in Judea only; so have we reason to believe, that the darkness which accompanied these miracles was of no greater extent than they; because the chief design of this uncommon appearance in the heavens was to convince the Jews who blasphemed our Lord, and his disciples who believed on him, both then present at his crucifixion, that notwithstanding all the humiliation to which he voluntarily submitted, he was in reality the great creator of the universe, and ^b even while he was hanging on the cross, the ruler and director of all its elements and motions.

God indeed, as he is an omniscient being, cannot but foreknow all the actions of mankind, and therefore, when he pleases, may foretell any of them; but then ³ if his foreknowledge, or predictions, did so far influence the will of men, as to lay them under a necessity of doing what he foreknew, or has foretold he shall do, all freedom in human actions must be destroyed; consequently all vice and virtue must be empty names, because none can be blamed for doing what he could not help; nor does any one deserve to be praised, who does only that which he cannot avoid: and consequently again, all future rewards and punishments must be discarded; because, as it would be unjust to punish one man for that which was not in his power to avoid, so would it be unreasonable to reward another for doing such actions as he found himself constrained and compelled to do.

When therefore we find the evangelist declaring, that ⁴ 'the Jews could not believe, because Isaiah ⁵ had said, God had blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts,' we must not suppose that this prophecy was either the cause or motive of their infidelity. It was simply a prediction, and, as such, laid upon them no manner of necessity or compulsion. Such prophecies indeed always include a tacit condition, which preserves to man the liberty of choice; and if, in their event, they prove certain and infallible, it is only because God certainly and infallibly foreknows the future bad dispositions of the people of whom he speaks, and has a clear prospect of that blindness and obduration which their perverseness brings upon them.

In relation to the Jews in particular, it is certain that ² Origen, in Mat. tract 35.

³ Whitby's Annotations on John xii. 38. ⁴ John vii. 39, 40.

⁵ Isa. vi. 9.

^b From the astronomical tables, some that are versed in this kind of knowledge, have informed us, that on the same day, when our Saviour died, about three in the afternoon, that is, immediately after the miraculous darkness which began at noon, and lasted three hours, there was a natural eclipse of the moon, in which half of its orbit was obscured; so that this day produced a literal accomplishment of two remarkable prophecies: that of Joel, 'The earth shall quake before them, the heavens shall tremble; the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining,' (chap. ii. 10.) and that of Amos, 'In that day saith the Lord, I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and will darken the earth in the clear day; and I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation,' (chap. viii. 9, 10.)—Calnet's Commentary.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xlx. 45—END JOHN. xii. 19—END.

our blessed Saviour did not think that his heavenly Father had, by an action or prediction of his, made it impossible for them to believe on him; ¹ for, had he thought so, he would never have exhorted them, as we find he does in the verses just going before, ² 'to walk in the light, and believe in the light whilst they had it'; and that to this good purpose, that they 'might become the children of light;' because every exhortation to do a thing which we know to be impossible, must not only be vain and delusory, but, if we know that impossibility to proceed from a divine judicial act, repugnant likewise to the will of God, which to suppose our Lord capable of, is the height of blasphemy.

Since, therefore, in the eastern phrase, a person is said to do that which he only permits to be done, God's blinding the eyes, and hardening the hearts of the Jews, must mean no more, than his suffering them to blind their own eyes, and harden their own hearts; which, upon the mere subduction of his grace, without the infusion of any perverse inclinations from him, they would not fail to do. And, accordingly, we may observe, that the same evangelist, in another place, speaks of their obturation and blindness as their own act and deed: 'For ³ this people's heart is waxen gross,' says he, 'and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed, lest, at any time, they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and should be converted, and I should heal them.'

Whoever considers the series of the sacred history, may soon convince himself, that the miracle which our Saviour wrought on the barren fig-tree, happened about the eleventh day of the Jewish month Nisan, on Tuesday, very probably before the passover; for the passover, we know, was kept on the fourteenth day of Nisan, which answers to the latter end of our March: and that, at this time, there were figs in Judea ripe and fit for gathering, we have some authority to believe.

When Moses sent away the spies to search the land of Canaan, it was, we are told, ⁴ 'in the time of the first ripe grapes,' ⁵ and they returned from searching after forty days, and brought from thence ⁶ pomegranates and figs, as well as clusters of grapes. Now, the Septuagint version says, that it was in the spring when these spies set forward; and Philo, in his life of Moses, seems to be of the same opinion. Supposing then that it was about the middle of spring, which, in Judea, began about the middle of January, that the spies set out, and that they were gone forty days, it will follow, that they returned some days before the passover; and if the figs, which they brought, as well as the grapes, were ripe and full-grown, then were they ripe in Judea in the very same time that our Saviour is here said to look for them.

Solomon, in his book of Canticles, gives us a lively description of the spring; and among other signs of its being come, makes mention of this,—that ⁷ 'the fig-tree putteth forth her green figs; ^a and the vines, with their tender grapes, give a good smell,' or as it may more literally be rendered, 'the fig-tree hath begun to give a flavour to her young figs, and the vines a good smell to the tender grape.' Now, if, in the middle of our January, the figs were so forward as then to give a flavour, it is sorts, the boccore, and the kermouse. The black and white boccore, or early fig, is produced in June, though the kermouse, the fig properly so called, which is preserved, and made up into cakes, is rarely ripe before August. There is also a long dark coloured kermouse, that sometimes hangs upon the trees all the winter. For these figs generally hang a long time upon the tree before they fall off; whereas the boccores drop as soon as they are ripe, and according to the beautiful allusion of the prophet Nahum, 'fall into the mouth of the eater upon being shaken,' ch. iii. 12. Dr Shaw, to whom we are indebted for this information, remarks, that these trees do not properly blossom, or send out flowers, as we render וַיִּצְרְפוּ, Hab. iii. 17. They may rather be said to 'shoot out their fruit,' which they do, like so many little buttons, with their flowers, small and imperfect as they are, enclosed within them. When this intelligent traveller visited Palestine, in the latter end of March, the boccore was far from being in a state of maturity: for in the scripture expression, 'the time of figs was not yet,' (Mark xi. 13), or not till the middle or latter end of June. The time here mentioned, is supposed by some authors, quoted by F. Clusius, in his Hierobotanicon, to be the third year, in which the fruit of a particular kind of fig tree is said to come to perfection. But this species, if there be any such, needs to be further known and described, before any argument can be founded upon it. Dionysius Syrus, as he is translated by Dr Loftus, is more to the purpose: 'it was not the time of figs,' he remarks, because it was the month Nisan, when trees yielded blossoms, and not fruit. It frequently happens in Barbary, however, and it need not be doubted in the warmer climate of Palestine, that, according to the quality of the preceding season, some of the more forward and vigorous trees will now and then yield a few ripe figs, six weeks or more before the full season. Something like this may be alluded to by the prophet Hosea, when he says he 'saw their fathers as the first ripe in the fig tree at her first time,' (ch. ix. 10); and by Isaiah, who, speaking of the beauty of Samaria, and her rapid declension, says she 'shall be a fading flower, and as the hasty fruit before the summer: which, when he that looketh upon it seeth, while it is yet in his hand, he eateth it up,' ch. xviii. 4. When the boccore draws near to perfection, then the kermouse, the summer fig, or cariee, begin to be formed, though they rarely ripen before August; at which time there appears a third crop or the winter fig, as it may be called. This is usually of a much longer shape, and darker complexion than the kermouse, hanging and ripening on the tree, even after the leaves are shed; and provided the winter proves mild and temperate, is gathered as a delicious morsel in the spring. We learn from Pliny, that the fig tree was bilera, or bore two crops of figs, namely, the boccore, as we may imagine, and the kermouse; though what he relates afterwards, should intimate that there was also a winter crop. 'Its late fruit remains on the tree during winter, and grows ripe among the new foliage in the following summer.' 'The fig tree produces a second crop,' says Columella, 'and protracts its ripeness till late in the winter.' It is well known, that the fruit of these prolific trees always precedes the leaves; and consequently, when our Saviour saw one of them in full vigour having leaves, (Mark xi. 13.), he might, according to the common course of nature, very justly look for fruit; and haply find some boccores, if not some winter figs, likewise upon it. But the difficulties connected with the narration of this transaction, will not allow of its dismissal in this summary manner. We say, in the narration, for we apprehend that the remark of Dr Shaw is quite satisfactory as to the reasonableness of our Lord's conduct on the occasion, notwithstanding the multiplied objections which ignorance and irreligion have urged against it. It is due to the late indefatigable editor of Calmet, to notice the conjecture which he formed, of the tree in question being the sycamore, which bears fruit several times in the year, without observing any certain seasons, so that a person cannot determine, without a close inspection, whether it has fruit or not. But, to say nothing against the authority by which the συκη is here proposed to be ren-

¹ John xii. 35, 36.

² Whitty, ibid.

³ Mat. xiii. 15.

⁴ Numb. xiii. 20.

⁵ Ibid. ver. 25.

⁶ Numb. xiii. 24.

⁷ Cant. ii. 19.

^a The fig-tree is very common in Palestine and the east, and it flourishes with the greatest luxuriance in these barren and stony situations, where little else will grow. Figs are of two reasonable to think, that, in so warm and fruitful a climate as Judea was, there might be ripe ones about the latter end of March, which is the precise time when our Saviour sought for them upon this fig-tree.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

The truth is, there were in Judea fig-trees of different kinds; and, besides the ordinary sort, which¹ according to our Saviour, did not put forth its leaves until the next approach of summer, the Jewish writers make mention of one early kind in particular, called by them Banoth-shuaoth, which never wanted leaves, and very seldom fruit. Nay, Pliny² tells us of some sort of fig-trees in Syria, under which name he frequently comprehends Judea, that had always leaves, and when the fruit of the preceding year was gathered, the new fruit began immediately, and was growing all the winter long: and therefore we need less wonder at what the emperor Julian asserts, namely, that, at Damascus in Syria, there was a sort of fig tree, whose fruit, both old and young, grew together, and lasted beyond a year. From all which we may be allowed to conclude, that there might be figs in Judea fit to eat at the time when our Saviour went to look for some on this tree; and for this reason some have³ imagined, that without offering any great violence to the text, the original words οὐ γὰρ ἦν καιρὸς ἄκων for 'where he was,' or, in the place he then was in, 'the time of figs was come.'⁷ And this, by the way, is enough to vindicate our Saviour in what he did, since there could be no injustice to the owner, as some would suggest, in ridding the ground of a tree which only encumbered it, and sucked its nourishment from it, without making any return.^a dered a sycamore, which has its own proper appellation συκομοραία (Luke xix. 4.), the assumption seems inadequate to account for the malediction which was levelled against it: because it is plain that such a tree might at that time have been destitute of fruit, and yet by no means barren. Dr Shaw's conjecture, therefore, seems to be the most satisfactory; namely, that as the fig tree always puts forth the fruit before its leaves, and this was not the season for figs, [rather fig harvest, for so the words, καιρὸς ἄκων, import] our Saviour was justified in expecting to meet with some on the tree.—Carpenter's Scripture Natural History.

¹ Mark xiii. 28.

² Natural history, b. 13. c. 8.

³ Universal history, b. 2. c. 11.

^a The alteration here proposed in the common version of Mark xi. 13, is inadmissible and is besides unnecessary. Καιρὸς ἄκων properly signifies, 'the season of gathering figs,' as καιρὸς τῶν καρπῶν Mat. xxi. 34, signifies 'the season of gathering the fruits,' (Macknight). In our translation the passage stands thus, which is strictly according to the order of the words in the original text; 'And on the morrow, when they were come from Bethany, Jesus was hungry: and seeing a fig tree afar off, having leaves, he came, if haply he might find anything thereon: and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet. And Jesus said unto it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever.' Mark xi. 13—14. Here the whole difficulty results from the connexion of the two last clauses of the 13th verse: 'and when he came to it he found nothing but leaves—for the time of figs was not yet;' for the declaration, that it was not yet fig harvest, cannot be, as the order of the words seems to import, the reason why there was nothing but leaves on the tree; because, as we have seen, the fig is of that tribe of vegetables on which the fruit appears before the leaf. Certainly fruit, says Mr Weston, might be expected of a tree whose leaves were distinguished afar off, and whose fruit, if it bore any, preceded the leaves. If the words had been, 'he found nothing but green figs, for it was not the time of ripe fruit,' says Campbell, we should have justly concluded that the latter clause was meant as the reason of what is affirmed in the former, but, as they stand, they do not admit this interpretation. All will be clear, however, if we consider the former of these clauses as parenthetical, and admit such a sort of trajectio as is not unfrequent in the ancient languages, though in translating into modern ones a transposition ought to be adopted, to adapt such passages to the genius of those languages; and such is here employed by Dr Campbell. The sense of the passage will then be as follows: 'He came to see if he might find any thing thereon, for it was not yet the time to gather figs: but he found leaves only: and he said,' &c. Similar inversions and trajections have been pointed out by commentators in various other parts of the New and Old Testaments, and Campbell particularly notices one in this very gospel (ch. xvi. 3, 4.): 'They said, who shall roll us away the stone? and when they looked the stone was rolled away, for it was very great,' that is, 'they said, who shall roll us away the stone, for it was very great,' &c. The spiritual application of this transaction to the case of the Jews is sufficiently obvious. We may, however, observe, with Storr, that the cursing was a symbolical action; and with Lightfoot, that it injured no one, since the tree, as we learn from Matthew, grew by the wayside, and therefore was common property.—Carpenter's Scripture Natural History.

Without entering into any other solutions; if there were two sorts of fig-trees in Judea, the one much earlier than the other, and thence two seasons of ripe figs, the one much later than the other, and as it is natural to suppose the latter much more common and plentiful than the former; the latter was properly called 'the time of figs,' and the evangelist might very truly say, that, at the time of the passover, 'it was not yet come,' that is, the common and ordinary season for figs was not come: though, admitting this to be one of the early kind, our Lord might well expect to find something upon it, since, by the speciousness of its leaves, it looked so promising at a distance.

He without all doubt, knew perfectly well, before he went up to it, whether it had any fruit on it or no; but as he intended to work a miracle upon it, and, by its speedy withering away, emblematically to show his disciples the near approaching ruin of the Jewish nation; be it what it would, it answered his main end: but then it could not have been so fit a type and resemblance of the Jews, had it not been barren; nor exhibited their fate in so lively a manner, had it not been cursed, and so withered away.

The Jewish nation indeed, at our Saviour's coming, was, in all degrees and orders of men, sadly corrupted; but in none so much as in the Scribes and Pharisees, who, pretending to be the doctors and expounders of the law, had vacated the obligation to almost all moral honesty, by the introduction of their false glosses and comments. Their great show of outward sanctity, however, much ostentation in their prayers and piety, and punctual performance of the ceremonial part of their religion, gave them great authority among the people, and as high a conceit of themselves; insomuch that they expected a blind submission to their injunctions, and all imaginable tokens of respect and veneration, whenever they appeared in public; though all this while, their pretended sanctity was but a veil to cover their vices, and inward impurity; an art to gain a reputation, by making the best of the shadow, while they wanted the substance of godliness.

Now, if such was the depravity of the Scribes and Pharisees when our Saviour lived among them, none can doubt, but that, as he was a teacher sent from God, he had a proper authority to reprove them, since under the Mosaic law, this was a duty incumbent even in private persons, and what they could not, without a manifest breach of charity, decline: for, ¹ 'thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him: ' where we may observe, that, in the eye of this law, not to rebuke our brother is interpretatively to hate him; and therefore our Saviour stands in need of no further apology for reproving the Scribes and Pharisees, who had such a number of sins upon them, since there was no omitting that, without violating this command.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

In his rebukes indeed there seems to be a spirit of severity, something that looks like anger, and several terms of diminution and disrespect. But then it should be considered, that as anger is a passion implanted in human nature, in itself, and upon all occasions, it cannot be unlawful; nay, when employed about proper and deserving matters, such as the honour of God, and reverence due to his laws, the love of virtue, and the correction of vice, it is not only innocent, but highly necessary and commendable. For there is a tameness of spirits which deserves censure; and, in such cases as these, we even do well when we are angry.

² In like manner, it may be observed, that terms of disparagement and reproach are, in some cases, allowable; and more particularly, when men, as St Paul expresses it, ³ ⁴ are rebuked sharply, to render them sound in the truth. ⁷ From the mouth of a superior they are often of use, sometimes of necessity, to rouse and awaken stupid men; to make them more effectually both sensible and ashamed of their follies; to expose the horrid absurdity of pernicious opinions, or the flagrant enormity of wicked practices; and, in short, are hardly ever discommendable, where charity is at the bottom; and an high authority in the reprover gives such language countenance.

Now, as none can call in question our Saviour's authority, if he thought it convenient to make use of such severity in his reproofs of a set of people, that most justly deserved it; so need not any be offended at his denouncing so many woes against them, when he finds God giving the prophets of old, sent to his priests, who were negligent in their duty, and corrupted in their morals, just as they were now, instructions to address them in the self-same manner; ⁴ 'Thus saith the Lord God, wo be unto the shepherds of Israel, that do feed themselves; should not the shepherds feed the flocks? Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed; but ye feed not the flocks,' &c. And again ⁵ 'Wo be unto those pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture. Thus saith the Lord, 'Ye have scattered my flock, and driven them away, and have not visited them. And if inferior prophets were commissioned to make such denunciations, much more might this great Messenger of the covenant, who was both invested with supreme power from the Father, and perfectly knew what was in every man's heart, and therefore could not miscal things, be allowed ⁶ 'to reprove and rebuke with all authority,' and without violation of that great law of charity, which is so peculiarly fitted to the evangelical institution, that, upon sundry accounts, it may not improperly be called a 'new commandment.'

⁷ This commandment indeed of loving one another, is by our Lord and Saviour so much enlarged as to the object of it, extending to all mankind, and even to our greatest enemies; is so greatly advanced and heightened as to the degree of it, even to the laying down of our lives for one another; and is so effectually taught, so mightily encouraged, and so much urged and insisted upon, that though it was a precept delivered by Moses, yet, considering in what manner the scribes and Pharisees had perverted the sense, and confined and discouraged the practice of it, it may well enough be said to have received in our Saviour a republication. And though it was not altogether unknown to other nations before, yet it was never so taught, so encouraged; never was such an illustrious example given of it, never so much stress and weight laid upon it, by any philosophy, or religion, that was ever before in the world.

There are three passages in the prophet Daniel which mention ⁸ 'the abomination that maketh desolate; and to any of these our Saviour may be supposed to allude; for they are all predictions of the dissolution of the Jewish state, when the sacrifices and oblations should be made to cease. It is the sense indeed that our Saviour seems more to attend to, than the words of the prophecy; and because it was the custom of the Roman armies to have an eagle for their ensign, in which they placed a kind of divinity, and to carry their emperors' images along with them, to which they paid a religious adoration, and therein committed such idolatry as was highly detestable to every Jew; ⁹ it is hence supposed, that the abomination standing in the holy place, means the Roman army, with these hated objects of their idolatry, besieging Jerusalem; and that it is therefore called a desolation, because it was appointed by Almighty God to lay the country, city, and temple of Jerusalem, desolate and waste; for so St Luke seems to have explained it by a parallel place, ¹⁰ 'When you shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know, that the desolation thereof is nigh.'

Jerusalem indeed may perhaps, in some places of Scripture, ¹¹ be called the holy place; ¹² but this is a title so peculiar to the temple, that we cannot but think, that our Saviour, in the application of the prophecy, intended it here; especially ¹³ since his disciples, by showing the stateliness of its buildings, gave the whole rise to his discourse. But now, if we suppose the temple to be this holy place, we cannot see how the abomination here spoken of could be the Roman army, and their ensigns; because neither of these were ever in the temple, until the taking and sackage of the city, and could therefore, in this respect, be no presages at all. If we suppose the city of Jerusalem to be this holy place, it is certain that this abomination was lodged in it long before the approach of Titus with his army; because the Romans had, all along, a strong garrison over against the tem-

⁷ Tillotson's Sermons, fol. vol. i.

⁸ Dan. ix. 27.—xi. 31.—xii. 11.

⁹ Whitty's and Hammond's Annotations. ¹⁰ Luke xxi. 20.

¹¹ Mat. iv. 5.; 1 Mac. x. 31. ¹² Calmet's Commentary.

¹³ Mat. xxiv. 1, 2.

¹ Lev. xix. 17.

² Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iii. ³ Tit. i. 12. 13.

⁴ Ezek. xxxiv. 2, &c. ⁵ Jer. xxiii. 1, 2. ⁶ Tit. ii. 15.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 10—END.

ple, in Fort Antonia, where their colours and standards were set up; nor can we readily conceive, why the military ensigns under Titus should be thought an abomination to the Jews, more than those under Pompey, Socius, and Cestius, who had all before him besieged Jerusalem.

These are some of the difficulties that attend the common interpretation; and therefore we should rather think, that the abomination and desolation here spoken of, should refer to that gross profanation of the temple which happened a little before the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem. While the Roman arms were in Judea, there were two contending parties in Jerusalem. ¹ Some were for accommodating matters with an enemy so vastly superior to them in power, and from whom nothing less than utter ruin was to be expected at last; others again were for making no terms at all, but, in hopes of some strange deliverance, for standing it out to the last; and among these was a crew of ruffians and robbers, who, from their pretended concern for the honour of God, which they could not bear to see prostituted to Gentile power, were called Zealots. This gang of men seized upon the temple, and fortified it; and having got into their possession the engines which had been left in the country by Cestius Gallus, when he besieged the city about three years before, with these they shot from the battlements of the temple upon the town, whilst those in the town shot likewise at them; by which means great numbers were killed on both sides, and the temple became thereby polluted with the blood of the slain that were within it, and by which means the daily service was intermitted, and the sanctuary, according to the Jewish notion of the word, became desolate. Here then was a sign peculiar, and what never had happened at any siege before, which our Saviour gave his disciples, in order to provide for their escape. Wars, famines, murders, massacres, divisions among desperate men, and investing cities by hostile troops, are no uncommon things in cases of this nature, and what the Jews, upon this occasion knew too much of by woeful experience; but to have the sanctuary filled with armed men, who were after killed in the holy place, and who, by being brought into the courts of the temple, actually defiled it with the carcasses, and blood of the slain, which were both of them to the highest degree abominable by the Mosaic law, was the distinguishing mark of this calamity; and when this once began to appear, the disciples were cautioned to decline the approaching storm, by making the best of their way out of Jerusalem; which they could not have done so well, had they staid till the siege was formed, and the Roman army had invested the town.

² That it was a custom among the Jews, before our Saviour's time, and, as they themselves affirm, before the beginning of the law, to baptize, as well as circumcise, any proselyte that came over to them from another nation; and in case such a person had any infant children then born to him, that they, at their father's desire, were, in like manner, circumcised, baptized, and admitted as proselytes, is manifest from the incontestible evidence of their writers. The incapacity of the child to declare or promise for himself, was not looked upon as a bar against his reception into the covenant; but the desire of the father to dedicate him to the true God, was accounted available and sufficient to justify his admission: and the reason they give for this is, that the things they were admitted to, were undoubtedly for their good; for one may privilege a person, say they, though he be incapable of knowing it; but one ought not to disprivilege any one without his knowledge and consent.

Now this gives great light to our better understanding the meaning of our Saviour, when he bids his disciples 'go and teach all nations, baptizing them.' Baptism he took, as the easier rite of the two; and, having converted it into an evangelical precept, made it the federal form of admission into his religion, as circumcision had been in the Mosaic dispensation; and, as he gave his apostles no directions in their commission concerning little children, it may justly be presumed, that, with regard to them, he left them to proceed just in the same manner as the church wherein they lived had been accustomed to do; and that was, to make them proselytes to his religion by baptism.

³ That in the Jewish church infants were part of those who engaged in covenant with God, is evident from these words of Moses to all the people: 'Ye stand this day before the Lord your God; you, and your little ones, that thou shouldst enter into covenant with the Lord thy God, that thou mayest be a people to him, and he unto thee thy God;' and that, in the Christian church, children, in like manner, are under the covenant of grace, is more than intimated in St Peter's exhortation to such persons as he had converted, that they would receive baptism, in order to make their children likewise capable of it, because ⁴ 'the promise was to them and their children;' that is, the promise of remission of sins, and of receiving the Holy Ghost, mentioned immediately before, which appertained to the covenant, belonged to them and their children.' Now, if the promise and covenant belonged to the children, as well as parents, there is no question to be made, but that baptism, which is the seal of the covenant, and the visible confirmation of the promise, belongs to them likewise; and if infants have a covenanted right to baptism, we may safely infer, that Christ never intended to debar them of it; and that, consequently, though they are not expressly named, yet are they most certainly implied in the commission of baptizing all nations. For, since the universal includes all particulars, and children make up a considerable part of all nations, the words of the commission may reasonably be supposed to comprise them. Nor can we forbear thinking, but that, when we read of whole families that were baptized, there must, of course, have been several children in them; because the word οἶκος, which, in this case, is rendered household, according to the observation of the learned, ⁵ is of a large signification, and takes in every individual person in the family, women as well as men, and children as well as grown persons.

⁷ The adult, indeed, before they were admitted as proselytes to the Jewish religion, were to be instructed in the fundamentals of the law, in the weight and burden

³ Hopkin's Doctrine of the two sacraments.

⁴ Deut. xxix. 10, &c. ⁵ Acts ii. 39.

⁶ Edward's Body of Divinity, vol. i.

⁷ Whitby's dissertation, added to his notes on Mat. xxviii.

¹ Joseph. Jew. Wars, b. iv. ² Walls' His. of Infant-baptism.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

of it, and in the nature of its rewards and penalties, and so profess their submission to it; but then it must be observed, that these pre-requisites in the parent, who was capable of such instruction, did not exclude the children, then born, from the rite of baptism: so far from this, that by the sentence of the Sanhedrim, the church was obliged to baptize them, as having a right to the ordinance by their parents' faith. And in like manner, they who are arrived at a competent age and understanding, were to be instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, were to ¹ 'confess with their mouth the Lord Jesus Christ, and to believe in their heart that God had raised him from the dead,' before they were admitted to baptism. This was a condition required of them, because they were able to do it: but why this condition should exclude their children any more than it did the children of Jewish proselytes, who were usually baptized together with their parents, we cannot see.

Our children indeed cannot understand the nature and end of the ordinance of baptism; but neither were the Jewish children, at eight days old, able to know what the purpose of circumcision was. They had no actual faith of their own, but the faith of those who present them in the congregation, is imputed, and themselves are sanctified by being born of believing parents. They have no manner of room for repentance, but then they have innocence, which is a much better qualification; and though they cannot stipulate for themselves, yet have they proxies and sureties, of ² early institution both in the Jewish and Christian church, to contract in their names, whose act is looked upon, and accepted by God, as theirs. In the mean time, that infants, and young children though insensible of what is done for them, may have favours conferred upon them, and are capable of receiving spiritual advantages to their souls, is plain from that passage in the evangelical history, where, when ³ young children were brought to Christ, he took them up in his arms, laid his hands upon them, and blessed them, namely, by praying for a blessing, by pronouncing a blessing, and by actually conferring a blessing on them; and if they are capable of being blessed, why should they be thought incapable of being baptized, since baptism in the main is but a solemn benediction, as it instates us in the privileges and benefits of the gospel, such as adoption and grace, the pardon of our sins, and the acceptance of our persons?

In short, ⁴ the covenant of grace is a deed of gift, made to us by Christ, wherein he promises to bestow upon us eternal life and happiness; and, as it would be absurd to say, that a child's name ought not to be put in any deed or legacy, until he come of age to understand it; so it is equally absurd, and far more injurious, to exclude our children from this heavenly legacy, which Christ out of the riches of his goodness, has bequeathed unto them: especially considering ⁵ that the primitive church did all along, and ⁶ every national church at this day in the world, does admit their children into the Christian covenant by this ordinance: that ⁷ many of the most ancient writers plead the necessity of it, for the expiation of original guilt, and ⁸ speak of it as a great sin in parents, and others, that have opportunity, to suffer any child of theirs, or any other person under their care, to die unbaptized.

In relation to the other sacrament, there can be no great difficulty in our Saviour's words, if we will but admit that the scripture very frequently makes use of figurative expressions, and in matters of a sacramental nature more especially, is apt to put the sign for the thing signified, ⁹ 'the three baskets are three days,' ¹⁰ 'the seven good kine are seven years,' ¹¹ 'the ram with the two horns are the kings of Media and Persia'; ¹² Sarah and Agar are the two covenants, and ¹³ 'the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches,' are instances of this kind: and when Moses, speaking of the paschal lamb, tells the Israelites, ¹⁴ 'this is the Lord's passover,' even before the Lord had passed over them, and smitten the Egyptians: and of the unleavened bread used at the paschal feast, this is the bread of affliction, which your fathers did eat in the land of Egypt;' his meaning can be no other, than that these things were a representation and memorial of what had befallen their forefathers in Egypt. And therefore it is no wonder, that our blessed Saviour, in the institution of this sacrament, should make choice of the like form of expression as was in use in the Jewish church upon the like occasion; and consequently, that when he says, 'this is my body, and this is my blood,' his meaning must be, that, 'this bread in my hand, and the wine in this cup, do signify and represent to you my body and blood, and that, in eating and drinking of these, you are made partakers of my body and blood, that is, of the real benefits of my death and passion.'

¹⁵ And indeed, if we consider, that our blessed Saviour celebrated this sacrament before his passion, we shall soon perceive that his words could not possibly bear any other construction. For how could he hold himself in his own hand, or give his disciples his body broken, and his blood shed, when at this time he was alive, and no violence had passed upon him? ¹⁶ They saw his body whole before them, and knew that his blood was in his veins, and therefore could not but conclude, that what they eat and drank, according to the evidence of their senses, was bread and wine, for had they understood our Saviour's words in the literal meaning, it is hardly imaginable, but that they, who, upon all other occasions, were so full of their questions and objections, would, upon the first hearing of this paradox, have started some such scruple as this:—'We see this to be bread, and that to be wine, and we see that thy body is distinct from both; we see that thy body is not broken, nor is thy blood shed: how therefore can these things be?'

The ancient apologists for our holy religion take notice, that this was one of the greatest accusations which heathens brought against Christians, that they did eat human flesh, which they endeavoured to refute, and constantly rejected as the vilest calumny, and most abominable thing. But now, had they understood our Saviour's words in a literal sense, and thereupon made

¹ Rom. x. 9.

² See Wall's Infant Baptism, introduction, sect. 34, part i. c. 4, part ii. c. 9. ³ Luke xviii. 15. ⁴ Hopkins's Doctrine of the two Sacraments. ⁵ Wall's History of Infant Baptism, part i. passim. ⁶ Ibid. part ii. c. S. ⁷ Ibid. part i. passim.

⁸ Ibid. c. 4, 15, 18, &c. ⁹ Gen. xl. 18. ¹⁰ Ibid. xli. 26.

¹¹ Dan. viii. 20. ¹² Gal. iv. 24. ¹³ Rev. i. 20.

¹⁴ Exod. xii. 11. ¹⁵ Tillotson's sermons in folio, vol. i.

¹⁶ Whitby's Annotations on Mat. xxvi. 26.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

it an article of faith, that they did daily eat the flesh of the Son of man, with what sincerity could they without all limitation or distinction not only have denied, but even detested the doing so.¹ Nay, nothing is more obvious, than that primitive writers continually ridicule the heathens for worshipping such deities as might be eaten; an instance particularly in the Egyptians, who made the same flesh which some of them did consecrate as a god, the food of others. But how can it possibly be conceived, that they should thus ridicule and expose the religion of heathens, for that very thing which made so great a part in their own; or brand that, as the very extremity of madness and folly, when done by others, which their faith taught them was the highest act of religious worship, when performed by themselves?² These things surely give us sufficient reason with Scotus, to admire, that such an interpretation should be put upon this one article, as makes our faith contemptible to all that are guided with reason; and at the same time to assert, that, it is apparently against humanity, and against piety, to break with our hands, to tear with our teeth, and to devour, as we do common food, the flesh and blood of Christ; and that the scorn of atheists and infidels will never cease, until the doctrine, which established these positions, be banished from the Christian church.

We own indeed, that the whole stress of the Christian cause lies upon the truth of our Lord's resurrection, and that all proper methods of convincing the world were necessary upon this occasion; but then it should be considered³ that our Lord being now, after his resurrection, to act according to the majesty of the divine nature, and not according to the infirmities and descension of the human, it did not so well comport with the dignity he had assumed, to converse publicly, or to submit himself to the censures, and fresh affronts of his enemies. But allowing it had been consistent,⁴ yet the unbelieving Jews, especially the chief priests and rulers, were of all men most unworthy to have so extraordinary a way of conviction afforded them.

They had already despised the evidence that was given them; and not only so, but maliciously imputed the plainest miracles that ever were wrought, to the power and operation of the devil. Now, if any thing can render men incapable of the favour of a farther conviction, such a malicious resistance of the evidence which our Saviour's miracles carried along with them, would probably do it; especially if we consider, that the greatest of all the miracles which he wrought in his lifetime, I mean the raising Lazarus from the grave, after he had been dead four days, was so far from convincing them, that though they could not deny the thing, they took occasion to resolve to put him to death: and therefore, what reason was there, that Christ should appear to them for their conviction, who had conspired to compass his death, even because they knew that he had raised one from the dead?

But supposing, for the present, that our Saviour had appeared publicly to the Jewish rulers; yet, since neither the darkness at his death, nor the earthquake at his resurrection; neither the declaration of the centurion on the one, nor the confession of the soldiers on the other occasion, had wrought in them any remorse, we can hardly suppose, but that, had he so appeared, they would have offered to lay violent hands upon him, as they before designed against Lazarus, and for the same reasons:⁵ in which case, had our Saviour vanished out of their hands, as doubtless he would, what would they have concluded from thence, but that they had seen a ghost, a spectre, or apparition? And what conviction would that have wrought, but that their senses had been imposed upon by a magical illusion? And what effect would this have had upon their minds towards bringing them to a belief that Christ was truly risen? None at all.

In many of the Jews, especially their chief-priests and elders, the god of this world had so blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts, that they would not have believed one title of our Saviour's resurrection; or, in case they did believe it, such was their malice and perverseness, that they would not have testified that they ever had seen him after his resurrection. Now they that are wicked enough to deny what they believe, will, at a pinch, deny also what they know to be true; and therefore, supposing that our Lord had shown himself to all his enemies, and to all the people, and but some of them, especially of the great men in authority, had denied that ever they saw him after his resurrection, this would have exceedingly weakened the testimony of those who vouched and confessed it: for he that appeals to the knowledge of another for the truth of a matter of fact, is so far from gaining, that he loses credit by the appeal, if the other person denies that he knows any thing of it. If therefore our Lord had appeared to his persecutors, (it being likely that his disciples would appeal to their knowledge,) they, by protesting the contrary, would have made a terrible advantage against the Christians upon that appeal. Herein therefore, is manifest the wisdom of Christ, that in making choice of particular witnesses, namely, such persons only as would be so far from dissembling their knowledge, that they would always be ready to seal their testimony with their blood, he hath settled the Christian faith upon a better foundation than if he had appeared in the temple, or in the midst of Jerusalem, to the whole people of the Jews.⁶

The truth is,⁷ it is not the number of witnesses, but the character and qualifications of the persons, together with the evidence itself, in its full force and circumstances, that are chiefly to be regarded in matters of this nature. If but a few men can, as the apostles did, by undeniable miracles make it sufficiently appear, that what they say is true, and that God himself confirms the truth of it; they can appeal to every man's own senses, before whom they work miracles, and make every one that sees them a witness to the truth of their doctrines. In this case, God himself bears witness to it; and what the high-priest said upon a very different occasion, every stander-by finds himself constrained to declare in this; 'What need have we of any further witnesses? for we ourselves have heard of their own mouths,⁷ in the miraculous gift of tongues,⁷ and seen with our own eyes,⁷ in the many won-

¹ Whity's Annotations on Mat. xxvi. 26.

² Ibid.

³ Jenkins's Reasonableness of the Christian religion, vol. ii.

⁴ Tillotson's sermons.

⁵ South's Sermons, vol. v.

⁶ Clagget's Sermons, vol. i.

⁷ Jenkins's Reasonableness of the Christian religion, vol. ii.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

derful works which they have publicly wrought, a full and authentic testimony of Christ's resurrection.

And this possibly may suggest the reason, why God permitted the apostle St Thomas to be so scrupulous and doubtful in this great article of our faith. He had been told, that our Saviour was risen from the dead, and the truth of it had been attested to him by evidences beyond exception:¹ several companies, who had seen him and conversed with him several times; to whom he had exposed the sight and feeling of his wounds; to whom he had expounded the scriptures concerning himself; with whom he had broken the sacramental bread, and conferred on them the benediction of the Holy Ghost; all these, with all these convincing tokens, had told Thomas that Christ was risen: but Thomas's reply was,² 'Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hands into his side, I will not believe.' It might indeed be urged before, that our Lord had not given all the proofs of his resurrection, that the nature of the thing was capable of; but³ now, when nothing is left unasked, that the most sceptical doubts could pretend to desire; when the very apostles themselves had one of their number that held out a while, and they preached not this doctrine, until his scruples were removed; when even this doubter himself was no less vigorous and positive afterwards in asserting the truth of a point, which nothing but demonstration could make him believe; this takes off all imputation of credulity and easiness. It shows, that the apostles proceeded with great caution, before they embarked in the cause of Christianity, which could not but reap great advantages from this apostle's backwardness to believe; and therefore our church justly acknowledges, that⁴ 'God, in his wisdom, suffered Thomas to doubt, for the greater confirmation of our faith,' according to that saying of one of the ancients, 'The unbelief of Thomas has been more profitable for our faith, than the faith of the disciples has been; because while he is brought to believe by the evidence of the sense of touch, our minds, casting off all unbelief, are confirmed in the faith.' This disciple, in short, doubted and was satisfied for us all. His former unbelief adds strength to the cause he pleads, and makes him a witness so much above exception, that the scruples, which in him were weaknesses, in those that pretend to follow him, and know his story, they will be wilfulness, and resolved infidelity.

His story, indeed, and the means which, as we therein read, our Saviour made use of to convince him, will instruct us in this, that, whatever changes our Saviour's glorified body might undergo after his resurrection, it was not altered, as to the properties of a body, whereof our outward senses are competent judges. To these senses it is that our Lord appealed; by these he composed the disciples, suspecting him to be a phantom; by these he satisfied the doubtful and incredulous; and by these the apostles make it their business to persuade the world, when they so frequently testify, that they⁵ 'had seen and heard him, had eaten and drank with him.' But now, if our Saviour's body was not subject to the same laws with other corporeal substances; if it could then pass through the doors in the manner of a spirit, and may at this time be, where our senses can discern nothing of it, though no other body can be so; then what satisfaction could Thomas receive in feeling his hands and side? or wherein would the strength of St John's argument lie, when he declares to his proselytes,⁶ 'that he had seen, and heard, and his hands had handled of the Word of Life?'

The indulgence indeed which our Saviour gave his apostles, to try all their senses upon him, gave them full satisfaction, both as to the materiality and identity of his body. But then, as all philosophy informs us, that no body can penetrate through another,^a we may reasonably infer, that when our Lord came to his apostles, on purpose, as it were, to convince them of the reality of his resurrection body, he did not glide into the room like a spirit, or phantasm, but, by his sovereign power, opened the door himself, even as the angel did the prison-gates to release Peter, secretly, and without the perception of any in the company, who might then be at the upper end of the room perhaps, and employed in some such business as took up their whole attention. For,⁷ unless we can suppose, that our Saviour designed to invalidate the strength of what he said and did, to convince his apostles of the truth of his resurrection, we cannot believe, that at the same time he would do a thing,

⁶ 1 John i.

⁷ Whitty's Annotations on John xx. 19.

^a Philosophy teaches us that all material bodies are impenetrable, or in other words, that every body possesses the property of excluding every other body from occupying the same space at the same time; but philosophy does not teach us (as the author asserts,) that no body can penetrate through another, for this would contradict common experience. Solids penetrate one another in the sense in which our author seems to use the term penetrate: fluids penetrate solids and solids fluids. Heat penetrates all bodies and expands them. Light penetrates transparent substances, the magnetic and electric fluids also pass through almost all substances. With regard, however, to the precise manner in which our Saviour appeared to the disciples while the doors were shut, it is vain, if not presumptuous, to inquire. Of the real nature of a glorified body we know little, but we may infer, from the reasoning of the apostle Paul, that at the resurrection bodies of the saints will possess powers and capabilities which far transcend those of our present gross corporeal bodies: and if this be true in regard to the spiritual bodies of the saints, it must be so in a far higher sense in regard to our Lord's glorified body; at all events, we can safely assert that the divine nature which resided in the glorified body of Christ, was able to effect greater miracles than the entering into a shut apartment by penetrating the substance of the door or wall, even supposing this to be implied by the Evangelist, (John xx. 19.) In what manner the miracle was effected (for undoubtedly the entrance was of a miraculous nature,) we are indeed not told; but nothing seems so probable in itself, or so agreeable to the analogy of the divine operation in other cases, or the beautiful economy which existed in our Saviour's working of miracles, in which he never employed more power than was necessary to accomplish any point, as to suppose that our Lord caused the doors to open of themselves. So Acts v. 19. 'the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors,' &c. and 23. 'The prison we truly found shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without before the doors: but when we had opened we found no man within.' Acts xii. 6, 7, 10. When they were past the first and second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city, which 'opened to them of its own accord.' The above would then be as much a miracle as that supposed by the commonly received hypothesis, and unquestionably an equal proof of Christ's divine omnipotence. The same view of the subject has also been taken by Calvin.—(See Doddridge's—Bloomfield's Crit. Digest.—Ed.

¹ Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

² John xx. 25.

³ Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

⁴ Collect. on St Thomas's day.

⁵ Acts x. 41.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

known and observed by them, which would in effect evacuate the force of all his proofs.

It is difficult, however, to imagine the reason, why our Saviour should so far condescend to his apostles, as to show his hands and his feet, desiring them to handle them, when, not long before, he forbade Mary Magdalene to touch him, because he was not yet ascended; unless we may suppose, that, after his resurrection, he might ascend several times, and that his first ascension was immediately ensuant upon it.

Now, to make this more obvious, we must remember, that, a little before his passion, our Saviour foretold to his apostles his sudden ascent to his Father, and as sudden descent to them again: ¹ 'yet a little while,' says he, 'and ye shall see me, and again a little while, and ye shall not see me, because I go to my Father;' and that afterwards, upon their surprise, and dispute about the meaning of the expression, ² 'Jesus said unto them, do you inquire among yourselves of what I said, a little while, and ye shall see me; and again, a little while, and ye shall not see me? Verily, verily, I say unto you, that ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice; and ye shall ye sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy,' &c. ³ Now, if we compare this prediction with the event, how sad and disconsolate the apostles were upon our Saviour's death, and how refreshed and joyful they were soon after his resurrection; and consider withal, that this sorrow was to last till Christ had been with his Father, and then their joy to commence; we shall be inclined to believe, that what our Lord would be understood to say, is, that he was to go to his Father immediately after his resurrection, and then very soon to return to his apostles again, even the very same day in the evening.

And indeed, considering that Christ was our high-priest, it was necessary for him to ascend into heaven, as soon as his sufferings were finished. For, as the high-priest, under the law, was not only to slay the sacrifice, but to carry the blood, that moment, within the sanctuary, and there present it before God, to complete the atonement, and make intercession for the people; so Christ, having shed his blood, and offered his body on the altar of the cross, was immediately to ascend into the heavenly sanctuary, and there obtain for us the remission of our sins, and all the other benefits of his passion.

But this is not all. In several parts of scripture our Saviour is invested with a regal, as well as sacerdotal character; but now, if, according to the testimony of the same scripture, he could not exercise any supreme authority, until he was exalted to his heavenly kingdom; if he could not ⁴ give gifts unto men, until he was ascended upon high; nor ⁵ send his Holy Spirit upon his disciples, until he was glorified, and had, by his intercession, ⁶ obtained that great promise of the Father; if he could not, I say, administer the affairs of his mediatorial kingdom, before he had conquered death by his resurrection, and had presented himself as a slain sacrifice and propitiation for the sins of the world, before the presence of the divine majesty; this makes it evident, that, on the very day of his resurrection, he must have ascended to heaven, because, in the evening of that day, we find him ⁷ giving a commission and instructions to his apostles; promising them the mission of the Holy Ghost; ⁸ blessing them in a solemn manner; ⁹ sending them as his Father had sent him; ¹⁰ giving them the power of remitting and retaining sins; and afterwards, in Galilee, ¹¹ assuring them, that all power was given him in heaven, as well as earth; and therefore commanding them to go, and teach, and baptize all nations, and promising his powerful presence with them, even unto the end of the world.

Now, if these exercises, both of the sacerdotal office and regal power, could not properly belong to our Saviour until his exaltation, then we have reason to suppose, that, in the morning of his resurrection, he privately ascended into heaven, to receive the reward of his humiliation in our flesh; and that the reason for his forbidding Mary to touch him, was, that by her officious embraces and importunity, she might not hinder him from ascending that moment, and, what was the crown of all his labour, carrying our glorified nature, as soon as possibly he could, into that blessed place where God's majestic presence appears, and where thrones, dominions, principalities, powers, angels, and archangels have their abode.

CHAP. III. Of our Blessed Saviour's Doctrine, and the Excellency of his Religion.

THE completion of the prophecies relating to the promised Messiah, in the person and actions of our Saviour Christ, and the miracles which he wrought, in testimony of his divine mission, and in conformity to what the Messiah was to do, were the subjects of the two preceding chapters, as the great external evidences of the truth of our holy religion; and the internal evidence is, the goodness and perfection of those precepts relating to practice, which he hath enjoined, and of those doctrines relating to faith, which he hath taught us in the course of his gospel, and which, when duly considered, will manifest the excellency of the Christian religion above all others.

Now, the practical parts of our holy religion, or those precepts which were intended to direct us in our duty towards God and man, are such as either tend to the perfection of human nature, or to the peace and happiness of human society. Of those which tend to the perfection of human nature, some enjoin piety towards God, and others require the good government of ourselves with respect to the pleasures of this life; and our business is, to show, that all and every of these are both conformable to the dictates of right reason in their practice, and declarative of the wisdom of God in their appointment.

¹² 1. That we should inwardly reverence and love God, and express that reverence by external worship and adoration, and by our readiness to receive and obey all the revelations of his will; that we should testify our

¹ John xvi. 16. ² Ibid. ver. 19. ³ Mr Whiston's Essays. ⁴ Eph. iv. 8. ⁵ John vii. 39. ⁶ Acts ii. 33.

⁷ Mark xvi. 15, &c. ⁸ Luke xxiv. 50. ⁹ John xx. 21. ¹⁰ Ibid. ver. 23. ¹¹ Mat. xxviii. 18, &c.

¹² Tillotson's Sermons in folio, vol. i.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR. A. M. 5412. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

dependence upon him, and our confidence in his goodness, by constant prayers and supplications to him for mercy and help, both for ourselves and others; that we should acknowledge our obligation to him for the many favours and benefits which every day, every moment, we receive from him, by continual praises and thanksgivings; and that, on the contrary, we should not entertain any unworthy thoughts of God, nor give that honour and reverence which is due to him to any other; that we should not worship him in any manner that is either unsuitable to the perfections of his nature, or repugnant to his revealed will; that we should carefully avoid the profanation of his name, by customary swearing or cursing; and take great heed, that we be not guilty of the neglect or contempt of his worship, or of any other thing that belongs to him; in short,¹ that we should possess our minds with such a due sense of the majesty, and holiness, and justice, and goodness of God, as may make us, upon all occasions, thoroughly fearful to offend him; of his majesty, lest we affront it by being irreverent; of his holiness, lest we offend it by being carnal; of his justice, lest we provoke it by being presumptuous; and of his goodness, lest we forfeit it by being unthankful. These are the general heads of those duties which every man's reason tells him he owes to God, and yet these are the very things which the Christian religion expressly requires of us; so that, in this part of Christianity, there is nothing but what exactly agrees with the reason of mankind.

In respect to the good government of ourselves, amidst the pleasures and enjoyments of this life, St John, when he tells us, that² 'all that is in the world, is the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life,' distributes the irregular appetites of men into three kinds, voluptuousness, covetousness, and ambition, answerable to the three sorts of tempting objects that are in the world, pleasures, riches, and honours; but when our holy religion requires of us, that³ 'we should not walk after the flesh, but after the Spirit; that we should, in short,⁴ walk decently, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness; but⁵ being holy in all manner of conversation,⁶ abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul;' when it gives us this strict caution,⁷ 'to take heed, and beware of covetousness; because a man's life,' or the happiness of his life, 'consisteth not in the things which he possesseth;' and calls upon us so frequently⁸ 'to be meek and lowly in spirit,' and not⁹ 'to mind high things; to¹⁰ let nothing be done through vain glory, but, in lowliness of mind, to let each esteem other better than themselves;' it is plain that it lays a prohibition upon all such irregular appetites and passions as are the bane of human ease and happiness, and enjoins such virtues and good dispositions as are not only highly reasonable, suitable to our nature, and every way for our temporal convenience and advantage, but such as dispose us likewise to the practice of piety and religion, by purifying our souls from the dross and filth of sensual delights.

2. In relation to the other sorts of precepts, which, as we said, tend to the peace and happiness of human society, they are such as enjoin all those virtues that are apt to sweeten the spirits, and allay the passions and animosities which sometimes happen among men. For when our most holy religion requires us, 'to love our neighbour,' that is, every man in the world, even our greatest enemies, 'as ourselves,' and, in pursuance of this general precept, 'if it be possible, and as much as in us lies, to live peaceably with all men;' to be kind to one another, ready to gratify and oblige those that we converse with; to be tender-hearted and compassionate to those that are in want, and misery, and ready, upon all occasions, to supply and relieve them; to sympathise with one another in our joys and sorrows; 'to mourn with those that mourn, and to rejoice with them that rejoice; to bear one another's burdens, and to forbear one another in love; to be easily reconciled to them that have offended us, and to be ready to forgive, from our hearts, the greatest and most reiterated injuries that can be done us; it discovers itself not only to be the most innocent and harmless, but the most generous and best-natured institution that ever was in the world.

In like manner, when our holy religion endeavours to secure the private interests of men, as well as the public peace, by confirming and enforcing all the dictates of nature concerning justice and equity; by recommending the great rule of doing to others what we would have them to do to us, as the sum and substance of the law and the prophets; by commanding obedience to human laws, which decide men's rights, and submission to all government, under pain of damnation; and by forbidding whatever is contrary to these, namely, violence and oppression, fraud and over-reaching, perfidiousness and treachery, breach of trusts, oaths or promises, indutifulness to superiors, sedition and rebellion against magistracy and authority; and if there be any thing else that is apt to disturb the peace of the world, and to alienate the affections of men from one another, such a sourness of disposition, and rudeness of behaviour, censoriousness, and sinister interpretation of things; in short, all cross and distasteful humours, and whatever else may render conversation uneasy or unsociable: when the laws of Christianity, I say, forbid these vices and evil dispositions, and, upon every occasion, command the contrary virtues,¹¹ whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise,¹² requiring us to 'think of these things;' we cannot but allow, that nothing can be devised more proper and effectual, to advance the nature of man to its highest perfection, to procure the tranquillity of men's minds, to establish the peace and happiness of the world, and, if they were duly practised, to make it, as it were, an heaven upon earth, than the precepts which we find recorded in the gospel: and, what is no small commendation of them, there is nothing in all these precepts, but what, if we were to consult our own interest and happiness, we should think ourselves obliged to do, even though it were never enjoined us; nothing, in short, but what is easy to be understood, and as easy to be practised by every honest and well-meaning mind.

Some, indeed, have represented even the moral part

¹ Young's Sermons, vol. i. ² 1 John ii. 16. ³ Rom. viii. 1.

⁴ Ibid. xiii. 13. ⁵ 1 Pet. i. 15. ⁶ Ibid. ii. 11.

⁷ Luke xii. 15. ⁸ Mat. xi. 29. ⁹ Rom. xii. 16. ¹⁰ Phil. ii. 3.

¹¹ Phil. iv. 8.

A. M. 4037 A. D. 33: OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

of the Christian religion, as an heavy burden and grievous to be borne; difficult to be kept, and yet dangerous to be broken; that it requires us to govern, and keep under our passions, to contradict our strongest inclinations, and many times to deny ourselves even lawful enjoyments; that it enjoins us to forgive and love our enemies, 'to bless them that curse us, to do good to them that hate and persecute us;' and, what is more, that it commands us to part with all the advantages of this world, and even to lay down life itself, in the cause of God, and the discharge of a good conscience. Hard sayings these, in some men's opinion, and such as our nature, in its state of degeneracy, is not able to perform. But this is for want of duly considering the obligation and tendency of such duties.

Some of the wisest heathens, even by the strength of reason, were able to discover the general corruption of human nature; but then they were ignorant both of the rise and progress of it; whereas, by the Christian revelation, we are sufficiently instructed in both. Here we find the baleful venom of our first ancestor's transgression entailed on their posterity; here the perpetual strugglings of flesh and spirit, and that violence of passions and desires that so often carries us into excesses, which our sober and better sense cannot but disapprove; and here that general bent to evil and backwardness to good, which every one, but such as are obdurate and insensible, is forced both to feel and lament; and therefore, since the gospel does not only show us our disease, but the malignity and true original of it, there is good reason why it should be allowed to press upon us the great duties of mortification and self-denial, as the best means within the compass of human power to cure us of it.

¹ The heathen sages, in the passage of their Hercules fighting with Antæus, seem to insinuate, that the only way to gain the mastery over our passions, is never to cease contending with them. Whilst Hercules grasped his adversary, and held him up in his arms, he could manage and master him with ease; but no sooner did he let Antæus touch the earth, but he got strength again, and was able to renew the combat. Antæus's touching the earth is morally no other than an earthly affection permitted to its element, that is, suffered to have its fill; at which time it gets strength, and grows masterly, and becomes less manageable than it was before: whereas, to grapple with our desires, to hold them off from the reach of their quarry, and to restrain them even from the lawful measures of enjoyment, is the only way, both to bring them into subjection, and to confirm our government over them.

The truth is, every time that we indulge our appetites beyond what is convenient, we give away so much power out of our own hands, we strengthen the enemy for the next attack, and disable ourselves still more for resisting it; and therefore, as the Christian state is deservedly called a warfare, that is, the necessary and continual engagement of our rational desires against our sensual, in order to bring them under, and keep them in obedience; and as in this warfare there must be no league, no truce, no laying down of arms, because the enemy is perfidious, and will never keep the peace; so are we never out of danger, but while we are actually fighting.

² The more we gratify our appetites, the more craving they will be, and the more impatient of denial; for every lust is a kind of hydropic distemper, and, in this case too, the more we drink, the more we shall thirst. If we give way to our passions, we do but gratify ourselves for the present, in order to our future disquiet; but if we resist and conquer them, we lay the foundation of perpetual peace and tranquillity in our minds; so that, in the whole, by retrenching our desires, especially when they prove exorbitant, we do not rob ourselves of any true pleasure, but only prevent the pain and trouble of farther dissatisfaction.

³ The ancient moralists, though they sometimes decry an insensibility of just provocations as a mark of an abject and little soul; yet upon no occasion are they so profuse in their praises, as where they speak of persons touched with a sense of injuries and indignities, and yet able, with a generous contempt, to overlook, and show themselves above them; for the passing by, and forgetting such things, the being very hardly incensed, and very readily appeased again, is constantly set forth as one of the brightest virtues that give lustre to a brave and truly noble mind. And if such were the notions of heathens, who professed to follow no other guide but the light of reason, surely the duty of loving and forgiving those that have injured and offended us, cannot be a task so very difficult to Christians, who, in matters capable of any tolerable construction, are required to put on that charity, ⁴ 'which believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things;' and, in the worst that can be, such a generous greatness of mind as 'puts away from us all bitterness, and wrath, and clamour, and evil-speaking, with all malice; such as should make us kind and tender-hearted,' ⁵ restoring those that are overtaken in a fault in the spirit of meekness; and such as should prevail with us, ⁶ to forbear one another, and to forgive one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven us.

And indeed, he who considers, that the very foundation of our religion is laid in the belief and profession of a pardon extended to the highest of all provocations, of love inconceivable to the worst of all enemies, and both these expressed and effected by a person the most highly injured, and in a method the most beneficial, the most amazingly kind; inasmuch that no instance of generosity or goodness besides presents us with any thing like it, with any thing near it, with any thing fit to be named with it: he who considers this, I say, cannot but acknowledge, that the precept of loving and forgiving our enemies is peculiarly suitable to the condition of Christians, who owe all their hopes and happiness to it: and that it would have been absurd not to have obliged those men to a virtue, which they confess themselves so infinitely beholden to, and ⁷ which no man can think a grievous command, who considers the pleasure and sweetness of love, the glorious victory of overcoming evil with good, and then compares these with the restless torments and perpetual tumults of a malicious and revengeful spirit.

² Tillotson's Sermons, in folio, vol. i.

³ Stanhope Sermons at Boyle's Lectures. ⁴ 1 Cor. xiii. 7.

⁵ Gal. vi. i.

⁶ Eph. iv. 31, 32.

⁷ Tillotson's Sermons, in folio, vol. i.

¹ Young's Sermons, vol. i.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

¹ 3. The Stoics of old represented their wise man, as no more concerned at the loss of his estate, his liberty, or life, than if they were the rattles or gewgaws of a child, which might afford him some little ease, and present diversion, indeed, but were by no means essential, or in any degree necessary, to his real happiness. This however is a flight too romantic to be credited. To lay down this life, and all the comforts of it, while men were so much in the dark about another, and to expose the body to sufferings, when doubtful, and in distrust about the soul, is too great an infraction upon self-preservation, because it is to part with one's all, at least our all in certainty and opinion: but to do this, when men know the reality of a future state, and the value of their immortal souls; ² to fear him, who, when he hath killed, can cast both body and soul into hell, rather than them who can only kill the body, and after that, have no more that they can do; to receive, embrace, rejoice in ³ the light affliction, which is but for a moment, when thoroughly persuaded, that it worketh out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; this is, not to destroy, but to save and profit ourselves, and what, in the affairs of this world, we esteem it our wisdom to do every day.

If by any sad accident our house happens to be set on fire, no man is to be blamed for doing his best to save his goods; but, when that is found impracticable, every wise man will choose to leave all, and escape naked, rather than out of foolish fondness for any furniture of value or curiosity, there stay and perish with it. Now this is no improper emblem of the case before us. When the fire of persecution breaks out among us, we have our Lord's permission, by all prudent and honourable methods, to decline it; but when it comes at last to catch upon these earthly tabernacles, that is, when our circumstances admit of no other choice, but either sinning or suffering, the loss of our lives, or the loss of our virtue, we owe it then, not only to God, but to ourselves, rather to quit this house of flesh, than bring the glorious inhabitant in it into danger of being buried in its ruins.

Upon the whole, therefore, this taking up our cross, or suffering upon the account of religion, is not choosing evil as such, but choosing an infinitely less evil, which, in this respect, is a great good. It is not exposing ourselves, when we might be safe; but, where we cannot be safe in our whole persons, redeeming one part with another, the better with the worse: it is not sustaining a loss, but making an exchange; an exchange of fugitive and perishing goods, for lasting and substantial; and parting with something of less value, in order to receive another thing unspeakably better, and more desirable.

Thus it appears that the three great precepts, which are commonly objected against, as heavy impositions, are the necessary result of the state and circumstances wherein we are placed; that the duty of denying ourselves arises from the corruption of the nature we are born with; that of loving our enemies, from the very genius and foundation of the religion we live under; and that of taking up our cross, from such prudential considerations as make us always choose the less evil; and are all so suited to the reason of mankind, that we find some of the best improvers of it prescribing the same rules to their disciples; ⁴ which is enough to convince us, that our Lord, who has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers, ought not by any means to be accounted an hard Master, when he imposes no other terms than the heathens thought fit to engage in, upon the mere spur of private conscience, or public shame; and that speechless, and without apology, a great part of the Christian world must needs stand in the day of inquiry, when it shall appear that Pythagoras, and Plato, and Zeno, could have their scholars run through such discipline, as is necessary to the character of a virtuous man, which those who profess Christ are not ashamed to call foolish and needless, only because it is unpleasing.

4. The other part of the Christian religion is, as we said, those doctrines which were designed for the direction of our faith, in matters that were not sufficiently revealed before.

⁵ That there is one supreme, absolute, and independent cause, and original of all things, eternal, infinite, all-powerful, all-sufficient, the maker and Lord of all things, himself derived from none, made of none, begotten of none, proceeding from none; that by him all creatures, material and immaterial, visible and invisible, animate and inanimate, rational and irrational, mortal and immortal, in heaven and in earth, were made, or created out of nothing: that having made the world, at first, he still governs it by his perpetual providence, insomuch that the most fortuitous accident does not happen, a sparrow does not fall to the ground, nor an hair from our heads, without his permission or direction; that, in the exercise of this his providence, every thing is submitted to his will; no strength can resist his power, no swiftness can flee from his presence, no secrecy can conceal from his knowledge, no art can evade his justice, and every creature participates of his goodness: that this infinite and almighty being did, from all eternity, and long before any ages commenced, in an ineffable manner, which the scriptures call generation, communicate the essence of the God-head so entirely to his Son, as to make him the same with himself, very God, of very God: that this eternal Son of God, having a being in the bosom of his Father, was partaker of his glory and power in the creation and government of the world, and, by the divine appointment, is our Saviour, Mediator, Intercessor, and Judge: that, having a tender compassion for sinful man, and willing to procure for him the grace of repentance, he voluntarily condescended to take our nature, with all its innocent infirmities, upon him: that, in this nature, miraculously conceived, and born of a virgin, he lived a life as we do, and was affected as we are, but without sin, revealed unto us his Father's will, and did many wonderful works in confirmation of his divine mission: that, after a life spent in doing good, he submitted, in his human nature, to a painful and ignominious death, that thereby he might make an atonement to God, and reconciliation for our sins: that, after a stay of three days in the grave, by his almighty power he raised himself to life again, conversed upon earth for the space of forty days, instructed his disciples in matters relating to his kingdom, and, at length, in the sight of a great

¹ Stanhope's Sermons at Boyle's Lectures. ² Luke xii. 4, 5.

³ 1 Cor. iv. 17.

⁴ Young's Sermons, vol. ii.

⁵ Clarke's Sermons, vol. ii.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

number of spectators, ascended visibly into heaven: that, upon his ascension, he was exalted to the right-hand of God, where he now makes intercession for us, and is invested with all power and authority, wherewith he governs the whole church, and is hereafter to judge the whole world: that, upon his investiture, he soon sent down the Holy Ghost, the third person in the ever-blessed Trinity, to be the immediate comforter and director of his apostles, to lead them into all truth, to inspire them with the gift of tongues and to impart to their followers such other gifts as might best serve the end of their ministry: that this blessed Spirit still continues with all good men, and¹ by illuminating their understandings, rectifying their wills and affections, renewing their natures, uniting their persons to Christ, and helping the infirmities of their prayers with his own intercession, is the great sanctifier of their souls and bodies, in order to make them acceptable in the sight of God for ever: these, together with the doctrines of the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and, after their re-union, an eternal state of misery or happiness in the other world, are the great and fundamental principles of the Christian religion and mysteries, as the apostle² calls them, 'which have been hid from ages, and from generations, but are now made manifest to the saints.'

'But how are these things made manifest,' says the objector presently, 'when, notwithstanding all the pretended light of revelation, they still remain obscure and unintelligible? Some articles of the Christian faith, such as the existence of a God, the dispensations of providence, the spirituality of our souls, a future state, and future judgment, we readily allow, because these are founded in the nature of things, and rise in the mind upon the disquisitions of reason; but, as for the stories of a trinity in unity, a co-equality in the Son, the incarnation of a God, and the propitiation made by the man Christ Jesus, of these we can frame no manner of conception; and therefore you must excuse us, if we do not believe them; for where is the crime of not performing impossibilities, or of not believing what does not appear to us to be true.'

It cannot be denied indeed, but that, in the Christian religion, there are many great mysteries, or doctrines of too much sublimity for the powers of reason, unassisted by revelation, to find out, or, when discovered, fully to comprehend; but this is no more than what we might reasonably expect, considering the nature and quality of the things it treats of. In its main intendment, it is a kind of comment upon the divine nature, or an instrument to convey right conceptions to the soul of man, as far as it is capable of receiving them. But now God, we know, is an infinite being, without any bounds or limitations of his essence; wonderful in his actions, inconceivable in his purpose, and inexpressible in his attributes: and how can such vast and mighty things be crowded in a little finite understanding? how shall our poor short faculties be able to measure the length of his eternity, the breadth and expansions of his immensity, the heights of his prescience, the depth of his decrees, and, least of all, the unutterable incomprehensible mystery of two natures united into one person, and again, of one and the same nature diffused into a triple personality? when a man that is born blind, as³ one expresses it, shall be able, on hear-say, to conceive in his mind all the varieties and curiosities of colours, or to draw an exact scheme of some fine city, or map of some large province, then may we expect, in this degenerate state of our understanding, to comprehend the ways of the Almighty, and by searching find out God. But, to do justice to the argument on the other side, as it would be extremely foolish and irrational, for a blind man to affirm, that there is no such thing as colours, or lines, or pictures, because he finds that he cannot form in his mind any true perception of them; so would it be equally, if not superlatively more unreasonable, for us to deny the great mysteries of our faith, because the plummet of our reason will not reach them.

While we continue in this state of imperfection, we must be content⁴ to know in part. A full and adequate perception of these sublime mysteries is reserved, as a principal ingredient of our felicity and happiness above, when all the heights and depths, which we now stand amazed at, shall be made clear and familiar to us; when God shall display the hidden glories of his nature, the wonders of his providence, and the wisdom of his counsels; and, withal, fortify the eye of the soul to such a degree, as to make it able, as far as the capacities of an human intellect can be able, to behold, and take them in.

To have a right notion of the doctrines of our religion, however, we are to distinguish between those things that are above reason, and incomprehensible, and those that are against reason, and utterly inconceivable.⁵ Some things are above reason, because of their transcendent excellency, and distance from us; whereas those that are against reason involve a contradiction, and have a natural repugnancy to our understandings, which cannot conceive any thing that is formally impossible. And from hence it will follow, that though we neither can, nor should believe those things that are contrary to our reason, yet we both may, and ought to believe those that are above it: and the reason is,⁶ because the only evidence we can give of our acknowledging the infallible truth of God, is by assenting to what he affirms upon his own authority.

In assenting to a proposition whose truth we perceive from the reason of the thing, we do not assent upon any authority at all. To such a proposition we should assent, though it were affirmed by the most fallible man, nay, though it was affirmed by the most notorious liar; and, consequently, our assenting to such a proposition is no manner of proof that we acknowledge the infallible veracity of God. This can only appear by our assenting to a proposition whose truth we do not perceive by any evidence from the nature of the thing; for here we assent upon the simple authority of God's affirmation, and our assent is an explicit acknowledgment of his absolute veracity. If then it be reasonable to expect, in a divine revelation, that God should require our acknowledgment of this attribute, especially, and without such acknowledgment no revelation would be of any use; and if this acknowledgment can appear only by our assenting,

³ South's Sermons, vol. i.

⁴ 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

⁵ Bates's Harmony of the Divine Attributes.

⁶ Rogers's Necessity of a Divine Revelation.

¹ Pearson on the Creed.

² Col. i. 26.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 9—END. upon the authority of God, to such propositions as we cannot perceive the truth of by an internal evidence; it certainly cannot be incongruous, to expect such propositions in a divine revelation. Nay, much more incongruous would it be, and ¹ a probable objection against the divinity of any revelation, if we should not find some propositions of this kind in it; because it is hardly conceivable, why God should make an external revelation of those things only, which, by a due exercise of our reason, he has enabled us to find out.

Seeing it is so far from being unreasonable, then, that it is highly expedient, and in some sort necessary, that there should be some propositions above the reach of human understanding, in every revelation that comes from God; if we can but show, that in the Christian system there are no doctrines, but such as stand clear of all absurdity and contradiction, the more abstruse and mysterious they are, the more they deserve our belief; for this very reason, because, ² if what is revealed concerning God were every way easy, and adapted to our comprehension, it could never reach, nor, with any fitness, represent that nature, which we all allow to be incomprehensible.

The holy scriptures, for instance, teach us, that in the divine nature, which can be but one, there are three distinct persons, to whom we ascribe the same attributes and perfections, the same worship and adoration. This indeed is a doctrine above our comprehension, as to the manner how three should be one, and one three; ³ but still we affirm, that there is no contradiction in it, if we will but distinguish between numbers, and the nature of things. For three to be one indeed, is a contradiction in numbers; but whether an infinite nature can communicate itself to three different substances, without such a division as is among created beings, must not be determined by bare numbers, but by the absolute perfections of the divine nature, which must be owned to be above our comprehension. The holy scriptures teach us, that the Son of God was made flesh, and dwelt amongst us; and that therefore our Redeemer was both God and man in one person. This, we own, is, in its nature, one of the great mysteries of godliness, as St Paul calls it; but then we must remember that, in reality, it is not much more difficult, than the union of the soul and body in all mankind, which, however unaccountable it may be to our reason and imagination, is too certain, in fact, to be called in question. Once more, the holy scriptures teach us, that our Saviour Christ, who was both God and man in one person, became the Redeemer of the world, by offering himself a propitiation to God for sinners. This, in many respects, is a mystery too, and what we could not have known, had it not been revealed to us; but now that it is revealed, it is far from deserving the imputation of being absurd. ⁴ That all mankind are sinners, and have fallen from their primitive integrity, not only the scriptures, but the constant experience of our own irregular appetites, is but too convincing a demonstration. Now, since this was our condition, and God was minded to rescue us from it, but entirely at liberty in what method to effect it; since the soul of our Saviour Christ was a free in-maculate being, that might voluntarily suffer for us, if he pleased, and by the dignity of his nature, enhance the value of his sufferings to the full pardon of our sins upon his Father's acceptance of a vicarious sacrifice; there appears nothing in this doctrine of Christ's satisfaction, now that we have it fully revealed to us, but what corresponds with common reason, and all judicial proceedings among mankind.

These are some of the principal doctrines that we, as Christians, profess; and being free, when rightly considered, from all appearance of contradiction, ⁵ we may appeal to the judgment of any considerate person, whether it be not for the dignity and advantage of religion, that some articles of it should exceed the largest human comprehension; whether we should entertain the same awful impressions of the divine Majesty, if the perfections of his nature and operations were only such as we could see to the end of; whether it does not raise the value of man's redemption, to have it brought about by miracles of mercy, not only without example, but even beyond our present understanding. Had all these things been less, we should indeed have known them better; but then so much as we abate of their mysteriousness, to bring them down to our capacity, so much we impair their dignity, and weaken the power of them upon our affections. It is therefore the very commendation, as we said before, and excellency of these doctrines, that they are so far above us; and we ought to esteem it an instance of the divine goodness, no less than wisdom, so to have tempered his revelations, that we want not knowledge enough to engage our piety and holy wonder, and yet have not so much as should destroy our humility and godly reverence: and upon the whole, have reason to believe, that it could not have been better, nay, probably, not near so well, if either less had been discovered to us, or less concealed from us.

The other doctrines, which in some measure were discoverable by the strength of reason, but have been set in full light, and cleared of all their ambiguity and doubtfulness, by the revelation of the gospel, such as that of the being of a God, the inspection of his providence, the supreme end of man, the immortality of his soul, the resurrection of his body, a future judgment, and an eternal state of happiness or misery hereafter, are so rational in themselves, and have so natural a tendency to what is the great end of all religion, the reformation of men's lives and tempers, that a very small illustration will suffice to recommend them. For,

⁶ What can be a more necessary and excellent foundation of true piety, than that doctrine which the Christian religion clearly and distinctly teaches us concerning the nature and attributes of the only true God, who inhabits eternity, and yet humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven and earth? What can afford more comfort and security in all conditions of life, than the sense of a providence, by which the very ⁷ hairs of our head are numbered, concerning itself for our welfare, and, for that reason, bidding us ⁸ to be careful for nothing, but, in every thing, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, to make our requests known unto God? What can be a more effectual means to wean us from the love of the world, and the allurements of sin, than to consider, that the proper and ultimate end of man is the fruition of God; and that though¹ it does 'not yet appear what we shall be, yet this we know, that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is?' What a greater incitement to purity and holiness, to love, and hope, and heavenly-mindedness, than the assurance given in the gospel, that when we are² dissolved, we shall immediately be with Christ; that³ 'this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality;' that our souls, when they go hence, return to God that gave them, and our bodies, when laid in the dust, after a short repose, are to be raised in power, and⁴ 'fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body?' In fine, what stronger and more powerful motive to deter us from vice, and allure us to all kind of virtue, than the discovery we have of God's having 'appointed a day, wherein he will judge the world in righteousness,'⁵ and render unto every man according to his works; to them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honour, and immortality, eternal life; but unto them that are contentious, and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil.' So that the articles of our Christian faith, you see, are far from being arbitrary impositions,⁶ calculated for the exercise of our credulity, or the gratification of our idle curiosity, but have an immediate relation to practice. They are indeed the genuine principles and foundations of all human and divine virtues; and,⁷ taken altogether, make a far more rational and consistent scheme of belief, than what the wisest ancient philosopher ever thought of, or the most opinionative modern unbeliever ever yet contrived.

¹ Law's Case of Reason.² Young's Sermons, vol. ii.³ Stillingfleet's Sermons.⁴ Whiston's Essays.⁵ Stanhope's Sermons.⁶ Clarke's Evidences.⁷ Mat. x. 30.⁸ Phil. iv. 6.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 23; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

But besides these doctrines, there are two ordinances peculiar to the Christian religion, which have an equal tendency to practice, and are so far from being vain and superstitious,⁸ as some are pleased to call them, that they carry their own plea and justification along with them. For what reasonable man can pretend to say, that it is anywise superstitious, for every member of the society which Christ has instituted, to be solemnly admitted into the profession of his religion by a plain and significant rite, intitling him to all the privileges, and charging him with all the obligations which belong to the members of that society as such, which is the design of one of the sacraments; or that it is unreasonable, or superstitious, for men frequently to commemorate, with all due thankfulness, the love of their greatest benefactor, and humbly and solemnly to renew their obligations and promises of obedience to him, which is the design of the other? But then, if we consider further the manifold benefits which we receive from these sacramental ordinances; that, by the former, we are admitted to the pardon of all our sins, the assistance of divine grace, the adoption of sons, and a title to a glorious inheritance; and that, by the latter, we have the covenant of mercy renewed, our breaches repaired, and our right to eternal happiness confirmed; that, in both, in short, we are made, and recognized to be, the children of God, and if children, then, according to that happy climax, are we heirs, heirs with God, and joint heirs with Christ, to the intent that we may be glorified with him: if we consider these great privileges, I say, we shall soon perceive the wisdom and love of our master, and only Saviour, in thus⁹ opening to us a fountain for sin, and for uncleanness, and in thus giving us the¹⁰ medicine of immortality, as the ancients style the eucharist, an antidote to preserve men from dying, and to give them a life that is everlasting.

But whatever inherent efficacy some may think fit to ascribe or deny to these sacred ordinances, it can hardly be thought but that, since, when they are duly observed, they are productive of many virtues and good dispositions; ¹¹ since, in the sacrament of baptism, we profess our sincere belief in the truth of that doctrine which God the Father revealed by his blessed Son, and confirmed by the miraculous operations of the Holy Ghost; in it we declare our humble acceptance of the overtures of mercy and grace, purchased for us by our Saviour, and in this sacrament exhibited to us; in it acknowledge our obligations to all piety, righteousness, and sobriety, as loyal subjects, faithful servants, and dutiful children to God; and in it devote ourselves to the faith and obedience of God the Father, our great and glorious maker, of God the Son, our great and gracious redeemer, and of God the Holy Ghost, our blessed guide and comforter: and, in like manner, since a devout reception of the supper of our Lord exercises and excites in us an awful sense of mind, answerable to the greatness and holiness of him whom at that time we approach; an hearty contrition for our sins, which exposed our Saviour to such pains and agonies as are therein remembered; a fervent love and gratitude to him, for his wonderful goodness and love to us; a deep humility, upon the sense of our unworthiness to receive such testimonies of his favour; a pious joy, in consideration of the excellent fruits accruing to us from his performances; a comfortable hope of obtaining the benefits of his passion, by the assistance of his grace; and, lastly, an enlarged good-will and charity to all our brethren, as being made heirs of the same hope, and not only washed in the same baptism, but fed at the same table with ourselves: since these, I say, are the graces and benefits which accrue to us by these holy ordinances, we cannot but applaud the wisdom of their institution, which affords such mighty helps to our Christian progress, and, by the blessing of God, are the happy instruments both of our living well, and of our living for ever.

From this brief review of the Christian religion, it appears, that the purity and practicableness of its precepts, the truth and sublimity of its doctrines, and the wisdom and piety of its sacramental institutions, cannot but recommend it to every man's conscience, that is neither bribed with vice, or tinctured with infidelity; for¹² if our gospel 'be hid,' if the beauty and excellency of our holy religion be hid, 'it is hid to them that are lost, in whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them who believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine into them.

¹³ And now, methinks, we may, with some confidence, challenge any religion in the world, to show us such

¹ 1 John iii. 2. ² Phil. i. 23. ³ 1 Cor. xv. 54.

⁴ Phil. iii. 21.

⁵ Rom. ii. 7, &c.

⁶ Archbishop Sharpe's Sermons.

⁷ Clarke's Evidence.

⁸ See Christianity as old as the Creation.

⁹ Zech. xiii. 1.

¹⁰ Ignat. Epist. ad Eph.

¹¹ Barrow on the Sacraments.

¹² 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

¹³ Tillotson's Sermons, in folio, vol. i.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

a complete body and collection of doctrines, both speculative and practical; of mysteries more sublime, and rational withal, more agreeable to the divine nature, and more perfective of human understanding; and of rules and precepts that would make men more pious and devout, more holy and sober, more just and fair in their dealings, better friends and better neighbours, better magistrates, better subjects, and better in all relations, than what we find recorded in the gospel.

Were there no other argument of the divinity of the Christian religion, but only the excellency of the doctrines which it teaches, this would be enough to convince any considering man, that it came from God. ¹ For, if it were nothing else but the result of natural reasoning, why should not other religions in the world, and other systems of morality, be as good as this? How comes the doctrine of Jesus Christ to excel those of all the famous legislators and philosophers in the world? How comes an obscure person in Judea to draw up such an admirable scheme of ethics, that whatever is laid down by the Lycurguses, and Numas, and Platos, and Aristotles, should not be comparable to it? How should he, in one or two years preaching, nay, in one short sermon, advance the practical doctrines to a greater height and perfection than ever they were brought to by any of the sects of philosophers, who had made it their business to study them for some ages? Most certainly unless God had been assisting in contriving this new model of the morality of Jesus Christ, it is impossible that it could ever have equalled, much less so far exceeded that of the Grecian schools, which had all the human advantages that he wanted on their side.

It cannot be denied indeed, but that, almost in every age there have been, in the heathen world, some wise, brave, and good men, who have carried human reason to a great height; and in the study and disquisition of natural religion, have made no mean discoveries; but then there is room to suspect, that their discoveries of this kind were not so much owing to the strength and sagacity of their own reason, as to the traditions they might receive from their ancestors, or the conversation they might have with the Hebrews, who had all their instruction from revelation.

That there were certain principles delivered by God to Noah, and by him propagated among his posterity, through all ages and nations, is what we may easily conceive; and thence we may suppose, that many points which seem now to be deductions from natural reason, might have their original from revelation, because things, once discovered, may seem easy and obvious to men, which they, notwithstanding, would never of themselves have been able to find out.

However, this he, it is certain, that, as the ancient philosophers might borrow many helps from their knowledge of the Jewish religion, which was the only revelation then pretended to; so, ² whoever compares the writings of later philosophers, of Epictetus, Antoninus, and some others, who lived since the gospel got footing in the world, with theirs who went before them, will find so manifest a difference, so much more unaffected solidity, and so near a resemblance to some of the most exalted Christian precepts as cannot well be accounted for, without supposing some acquaintance with a set of principles, which they could not but approve and admire, and affected to ingraft into their own systems of morality, though they never expressly avowed the authority on which they stand. These were great helps; and it is no wonder, that under the influence of these they wrote so well. But if we look into the tracts of those that went before them, and were unassisted by revelation, we shall find them miserably ignorant of many important points that are delivered to us with the greatest perspicuity.

They were ignorant, as we had occasion to show ³ before, of the creation of the world, and the origin of mankind; ignorant of the rise of evil, or the cause of human depravation; ignorant of any form of worship that might be acceptable to God, and of any way to appease his displeasure; and quite ignorant of the method which he, in his eternal counsel, had ordained for the recovery of lost man, without any infraction upon his attributes. They had but confused notions of the nature of the supreme being, and talked very inconsistently of the summum bonum, or ultimate felicity of man. They taught but little of God's exceeding love towards us, and desire of our happiness; and were entirely silent as to the divine grace and assistance towards our attainment of virtue, and perseverance in it. The immortality of the soul was to them a moot point; the certainty of a future state they were not well agreed in; and, as for the resurrection of the body, this, ⁴ in their very seats of learning, was thought a doctrine highly absurd and ridiculous. So doubtful, so ignorant were they in these main and fundamental points, which are the great restraints of our inordinate appetites; and therefore no wonder, if, ⁵ having their understanding darkened, as the apostle describes them, and being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in them, they gave themselves up unto lasciviousness, and to work all uncleanness with greediness.

Nay, well had it been, had they confined their lewdness and debauchery within private walls; but the misfortune was, that they entered their temples, and made no small part of their religious worship. ⁶ They deified the worst of men, a drunken Bacchus, an effeminate Ganymede, a Romulus unnatural to his brother, a Jupiter as unnatural to his father. ⁶ They paid adoration, not only to the ghosts of such as these, but to birds, and beasts, and creeping things, and even to the devil himself, under images of such hideous forms and shapes, as were

³ See Cave's Apparatus the first, p. 18. et seq.

⁴ Acts xvii.

⁵ Eph. iv. 18, 19.

⁶ Jenkins's Reasonableness of the Christian religion, vol. i.

a Can any thing be so stupid, as to load the divine nature with so many crimes and imperfections as the heathen theology does; to make one God, and that the supreme God too, an adulterer, and another a pimp; one goddess a scold, and another a whore; to stock heaven with strumpets and sodomites, and drunkards, and bastards; to make their deities fighting and quarrelling, dissembling and lying; to be lame, and blind, and old, and wounded? Can any thing be more foolish, than the stories of their theogony; of their gods, not only begetting children like men, but eating them like cannibals; their battles with Titans and giants, and their running out of heaven for security upon earth? What wretched silly stuff is the history of their demi-gods or heroes, of Perseus, Theseus, Orpheus, and all the other contradictory tales which we read of in Ovid's Metamorphoses, which is nothing else but a compendium of the heathen divinity.—Nichols's conference with the Theist, vol. ii. part 4.

¹ Nichols's conference with the Theist, vol. ii. part 1.

² Stanhope's Sermons at Boyle's Lectures.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

frightful to behold. Nay, and in the worship of him, they made their altars smoke with the blood of human sacrifices, of their sons and their daughters, and that in some places, every day, and upon extraordinary emergencies, even as it is the practice of some Pagan countries at this very time, in whole hecatombs. So blinded were the eyes of their understanding, and so hardened their hearts, against all tender impressions, by the deceitfulness of sin, and the infatuation of the devil.

Men may talk of the natural light and power of reason as long as they please; and the topic perhaps is well enough for popular eloquence to flourish upon; but when we appeal to experience, we shall soon find it empty boast, and pompous harangue. If ever there was a time when human reason might be a guide in matters of religion,¹ it was when our Saviour came into the world, or some time before; when knowledge of all kinds, and particularly the study of philosophy, was cultivated and improved with the greatest application, by the ablest hands; and yet it is hardly possible to read the first chapter of the epistle to the Romans, without amazement, and many mortifying reflections, to find rational creatures capable of so wretched a degeneracy, as to verify the apostle's description of them, when he tells us, that they² 'were filled with unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; were full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; were whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things; were disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful, and (what is worse still) not only did these things themselves, but took pleasure likewise in those that did them.

In this light it is that the apostle represents the state of the heathen world, while it was under the guidance of unassisted reason: and if our reason seems to guide us any better now; if it rejects those detestable deeds of darkness, and impious modes of worship, which it once revered and embraced, it is not because its faculties are in themselves any clearer or stronger than they were, but because it has submitted its weakness and ignorance, its pride and passions, to the light and authority of the Christian revelation.³ Take but away the direction and restraint of this authority, and it will act just as it did, and relapse into the same extravagances, the same impiety, the same folly and superstition, that prevailed on it before.

And if the pagan religion, when supported with the highest improvements of human understanding, fell so far short of being a rational service, what shall we say to the Mahometan, which envelops itself in ignorance, and makes its main foundation the gratification of men's brutal lusts and appetites? One would really wonder how so corrupt an institution came to spread so wide in the world, but that there was a concurrence of circumstances, at that time, which did not a little contribute to its propagation.

⁴ When Constantine and his followers had made the profession of the Christian religion not only safe but honourable, bishops grew ambitious, and minded nothing so much as their advancement to the best preferments.

¹ Bishop of London's second Pastoral Letter. ² Rom. i. 29, &c.

³ Rogers's Necessity of Divine Revelation.

⁴ Grotius De verit. b. 6.

Schism and heresies over-ran the church; rites and ceremonies were more esteemed than purity of heart; and a general corruption infected both clergy and laity alike. This juncture God in his just judgment permitted Mahomet to lay hold on, to set up a new religion,⁵ which being a kind of medley, made up of Judaism, the several heresies then in the east, and the old Pagan rites of the Arabs, with an indulgence to all sensual delights, and the enforcement of secular power and violence, did too well answer his design in drawing or forcing men of all sorts to the profession of it; insomuch that it soon gave birth to an empire, which, in eighty years' time, extended its dominions over more kingdoms and countries than ever the Roman could in eight hundred. And although it continued in its strength not above three hundred years, yet out of its ashes have sprung up many other kingdoms and empires, of which there are three at this day, the largest and most potent upon the face of the earth, namely, the empire of Turkey, the empire of Persia, and the empire of the Mogul in India, which God, in his all-wise providence, has permitted still to continue, for a scourge unto us Christians, who, having received so holy and so excellent a religion through his mercy to us, in Christ Jesus our Lord, will not yet conform ourselves to live worthy of it.⁶

This we must observe, however, that God does not always approve those actions and designs, which, to demonstrate the wisdom of his providence, he is sometimes pleased to permit and prosper; that a religion propagated by force, and supported by the methods of external strength, is so far destitute of any proof, that its original is from heaven; and that, when it contains such doctrines as are repugnant to the dictates of right reason, or the known properties and attributes of God, it can be the product of nothing else but human invention.

⁶ When therefore, we find Mahomet establishing his religion by the dint of the sword, persecuting with war all that would not submit to it, and threatening with no less than death all that pretended to dispute the least article of it;⁷ whereas the Christian, quite otherwise, was planted in weakness and disgrace, in tears, and prayers, and patience, and watered with the blood of many thousands of its professors: when we find him allowing of fornication, justifying adultery, and talking of war, rapine, and slaughter, as things enjoined and commanded by Almighty God; whereas what we have learned from Christ and his apostles is,⁸ 'possess every one his vessel in sanctification and honour; not in the lust of concupiscence; to live peaceably with all men;' and, instead of invading any other's property,⁹ 'to take joyfully the spoiling of our goods, knowing that in heaven we have a better and enduring substance:' when we find him, the better to allure his followers, telling them¹⁰ of pleasant

⁵ Prideaux's Life of Mahomet.

⁶ Ibid.

⁷ Stanhope's Sermons at Boyle's Lectures. ⁸ 1 Thes. iv. 4, 5.

⁹ Heb. x. 34.

¹⁰ Prideaux's Life of Mahomet.

a Since the period at which our author wrote, the extent and power of these empires have been greatly diminished; whilst that of the Mogul has been in fact annihilated. But we lately saw another power, founded in atheism, spread its dominion, undoubtedly for the same purpose, over almost all the Christian states of Europe. It too hath been overthrown; but whether Christians have really profited by the severe chastisement which they received, can be ascertained only by their conduct during the peace of the world, which has not yet been of very long duration.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN. xii. 19—END.

gardens, curious fountains, delicate beds, and beautiful women with black eyes and fair complexions, in paradise, with whom they shall enjoy continual pleasures and solace themselves with amorous delights to all eternity; whereas we are told, that in the resurrection we¹ neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven,² where we shall come to company suitable to our glorified natures,³ to the general assembly and church of the first born, to the spirits of just men made perfect, to an innumerable company of angels, to God the judge of all, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant: when we compare these things together, I say, we shall find the one abhorrent to the nature of God, injurious to the dignity of mankind, and a contradiction to that eternal law of righteousness which is written in every one's breast; but the other agreeable to the notions we have of the supreme being, and consonant to the rational dictates of our nature.

If we proceed to compare the transactions of Christ's life with those that are related of Mahomet; how our blessed³ Saviour went about doing good, healing all manner of sickness and of disease among the people, giving sight to the blind, and feet to the lame, and life to the dead; how the miracles which he wrought were solemn and grave, acts of his love to mankind, and demonstrations of his omnipotence; and⁴ how those who embraced his religion, in virtue of those miracles, were men of innocence and simplicity, who lived good lives, and feared God, and were therefore under the divine protection, secured from the deceivableness of error; whereas the followers of Mahomet were a gang of robbers and plunderers, void of all piety, and all humanity; himself a bold ambitious man, greedy of empire, and resolved to raise himself even at the destruction of his fellow-creatures; and the miracles reported of him, such as⁵ his cleaving the moon in two, the trees going out to meet him, the stones saluting him, the camel and the shoulder of mutton speaking to him, and his wonderful journey to heaven, with all the strange sights he there beheld, are, to the highest degree, absurd^a and ridiculous: if we compare these things together, I say, we shall soon perceive in whom the characters of a true prophet meet, and who is to be deemed the wicked impostor; whose religion was intended to civilize and sanctify human nature, and consequently is the gift of God; and whose calculated to gratify the cruel and carnal appetites of rude barbarians, and consequently is the forgery of man.

The Jewish religion indeed derived its origin from heaven, and Moses seems to glory in the excellency of its institutes, when he asks the people,⁶ 'what nation is there so great, that has statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law which I set before you this day?' and yet, if we were to descend to an examination, we should soon perceive, in many great discoveries, the pre-eminence of the gospel above the law.

¹ Mat. xxii. 30. ² Heb. xii. 23, 24. ³ Mat. iv. 24.

⁴ Grotius de Verit. ⁵ Prideaux's life of Mahomet.

^a What strange stuff do we find in the Alcoran about the angel of death, whose head is so big, that from one eye to another is a journey of a thousand and seventy days; of the angels in the sixth heaven, one of which has seventy thousand heads, and as many tongues: of the cow supporting the earth, which has four hundred horns, and, from one horn to another, is a journey of a thousand years; of the angels which support the throne of God, and have heads so big, that a bird cannot fly from one ear to another; of the key of the treasury of one of Moses's subjects, which was so heavy, that it weighed down a camel; and of the wives and different shapes of angels, some of which are like men, others like horses, bulls, and cocks, &c. with many more nonsensical absurdities of the like nature!—Nichol's Conference with the Theist, vol. ii. part iv.

⁷ 1. That there is a God, and that there is but one God; that the only one God is incorporeal, invisible, immortal, eternal, omnipotent, omniscient, of infinite justice, wisdom, and goodness, the maker of heaven and earth, the supreme governor of the world, and of all things therein, and a gracious rewarder of those that seek him, is absolutely necessary to be known by all who would attain eternal life; and it cannot be doubted, but that the faithful, from the beginning, had this knowledge of God; but then, before the coming of Christ, they had not so certain, so clear, and so distinct a knowledge of these things, as we have now under the gospel. For, over and above the knowledge of these things, which the pious, before Moses, had either from a serious contemplation of the works of God, or from the tradition and instruction of the patriarchs, and which the Jews, in succeeding ages, had from the writings of Moses and the prophets; we, Christians, have a more clear, more distinct, and evident manifestation thereof from the books of the evangelists and apostles.

The faithful, under the Jewish dispensation, did, without doubt, believe God to be an invisible and omnipresent spirit; and yet his frequent appearances, sometimes under one resemblance, and sometimes under another, the building of an ark, a tabernacle, and temple, whether he was pleased to call his people together into his immediate presence, and to talk with them, as Moses⁸ expresses it, face to face, must necessarily turn their eyes and minds towards the mercy seat; make them apprehend God shut up, as it were, within the holy of holies, and consequently perplex and obscure their notions of his spirituality and omnipresence: whereas there is no room now, under the gospel, for any gross conceptions of the Deity, when we are called upon, not to turn our eyes towards a visible tabernacle, but⁹ 'to pray every where,' in any place, 'lifting up holy hands;' and are taught by Christ,¹⁰ that 'God is a spirit,' and that 'they who worship him, worship him in spirit and in truth.'

The believers under the law were persuaded, that all things were ordered and governed by an all-wise and all-powerful being; and yet the most sagacious of them were not able to account for the justice of divine providence, in suffering the wicked to prosper, and the righteous to be afflicted. But now this difficulty every common Christian is able to solve, by the help of what he has learned from the gospel concerning the retributions of a future state; and can apply to all such cases the reflection made by Abraham, on the rich man's desire of some relief from Lazarus,¹¹ 'son, remember that thou, in thy lifetime, receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented.'

2. The nature and obliquity of sin is what men, in all ages, could not but perceive; but how to account for its ⁶ Deut. iv. 8. ⁷ Smallridge's Sermon. ⁸ Deut. v. 4.

⁹ 1 Tim. ii. 8. ¹⁰ John iv. 24. ¹¹ Luke xvi. 25.

A. M. 437. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM MAT. xx. 10—END. MARK xi. 15—END. LUKE xix. 45—END. JOHN xii. 19—END.

cause and origin, they were at a strange loss: and therefore some imagined a pre-existent state, from whence they brought depravity along with them; while others devised two contrary principles, equally actuating the world, the one the author of all the good, and the other of all the evil they did. ¹ 'The wickedness of man,' as Moses tells us, 'was great in the earth, and every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was evil continually;' but whether these expressions are to be extended to the whole race of mankind, and so are a proof of the general depravation, has been doubted by some: whereas all such doubts must now be silenced by the plain assertions in the New Testament, that ² 'by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so that ³ by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation;' that all who are of the race of mankind, are sinners, ungodly, enemies of God, children of the devil, and by ⁴ nature the children of wrath; that ⁵ when they would do good, evil is present with them, having a law in their members warring against the law of their mind, and bringing them into captivity to the law of sin; and that this is the state of depraved nature, wherein men are born, and wherein those that live and die shall ⁶ 'be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.'

3. And as the gospel gives us a more distinct account of the origin and demerit of sin, so does it furnish us with a clearer discovery of the method whereby the guilt of it is atoned. Those who lived under the Mosaic dispensation, were saved by the same means of redemption, as we who live under the evangelical; but the mystery of our common redemption was not, in any degree, so fully manifested to them as it is to us: and hence it is, that the apostle compares the writings of the Old Testament to a ⁷ light, or, as the original is, to a candle shining in a dark place; but the revelation which was made by Christ in the gospel, to the day-dawn, and the day-star arising in our hearts. The revelation made to the Jews was to them a light, but a faint one; it shone, but in a dark place. The nativity, life, and death of Christ, the several offices of his mediatorship, the remission of our sins through his blood, the sanctification of our hearts by his Spirit, and the glories of the world to come, were taught them, not in words at length, but in figures, and a dark veil was over the writings as well as over ⁸ the face of Moses, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold his doctrine, any more than they could his countenance. In a word, ⁹ they were saved, as well as we, by the blood of Christ; but there was as great a difference between their knowledge of the mystery of our redemption by the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and ours, as there was between that dark cloud wherewith God led the people at one time, and that pillar of light wherewith he guided them at another.

4. And as the gospel gives us clearer notions of the expiation of sin, so does it exhibit a fuller assurance of our being justified, or having our sins pardoned thereby. Religious persons, who lived before the coming of Christ, knew that they were sinners, and that they therefore had need of the mercy and favour of God, for the remission of their sins; but then, being not sufficiently instructed in the method of obtaining God's favour, they could not but groan sorely under the weight of them. Severe curses were denounced in the law against all who should, in any case, transgress it; these curses were plain, and easy to be understood; but the promises of a pardon, through the merits of a Saviour, were more intricate and involved. When therefore the danger which threatened them was so apparent, and the methods of their escape so obscurely notified to them, it is no wonder if their fears did very much overbalance their hopes. Hence it is, that the spirit by which they were governed, is in the gospel represented as a spirit of bondage; but the spirit by which we Christians are influenced, is a spirit of adoption: ¹⁰ 'ye have not now,' says the apostle, 'received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father;' that is, whereby we are as well assured of the love of God, as a child is sure of the affection of an indulgent father; as surely entitled to the joys of heaven, as an adopted son is to the inheritance of him who therefore adopted him, that he might make him his heir; for, as the apostle goes on to display the privileges of the Christian dispensation, 'the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs, heirs with God, and joint-heirs with Christ.'

5. And as the assurances given us of this inheritance are greater, so, lastly, is the inheritance itself much more plainly revealed to us in the gospel, than ever it was before. Whatever could be learned of a future state from the light of reason, that, and much more, was known to the Jews; what, by reason and by revelation, was made known to the Jews concerning an immortal life, that, and much more, is manifested to us Christians. The texts in which a future state is revealed to the Jews, are few, and here and there thinly scattered in some particular books of the Old Testament; but there is no one book, scarce one chapter, in which this doctrine is not taught in the New. Those in the Old Testament are not so clear of ambiguity, but that they are capable of another interpretation; those in the New are so plain and perspicuous, that there is no room for the most ignorant to misapprehend, or the most invidious to pervert them: and therefore it is with great justice that the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, who himself was excellently versed in the knowledge of the Jewish law, hath observed, that ¹¹ 'the law had only the shadow of good things to come, but not the very image of the things;' that is, it did but obscurely and faintly typify the glories of heaven; not give us so bright an image, and so lively a representation of the rewards of another world, as is pictured out to us, and, in all its full proportion and lineaments, accurately described in the gospel.

¹² Upon the whole, therefore, it appears how incomparably happy we Christians are under the gospel, above what the Jews were in the time of the law; God having placed us under the best of dispensations, under the clearest discoveries and revelations, and given us the most noble, rational, and masculine religion; a religion

¹ Gen. vi. 5. ² Rom. v. 21. ³ Ibid. ver. 18. ⁴ Eph. ii. 3.

⁵ Rom. vii. 21, 23.

⁶ 2 Thess. i. 9.

⁷ 2 Pe. i. 19.

⁸ 2 Cor. iii. 7.

⁹ Smallbridge's Sermons.

¹⁰ Rom. viii. 15, &c.

¹¹ Heb. x. 1.

¹² Cave, in his Apparatus to the Lives of the Apostles.

the most perfective of our natures, and most conducive to our happiness. And what indeed can be a nobler privilege, what a more generous and delightful pleasure, what a more powerful incentive to obedience, than for a rational creature clearly to discern the equity, the necessity, the benefit, the decency, and beauty of every action he is called upon to do : and thence to be duly sensible how gracious a master he serves ; one who is so far from loading him with fruitless and arbitrary impositions, that each command, abstracted from his authority who gives it, is able to recommend itself, and nothing required but what every wise man would choose of his own accord, and cannot, without being his own enemy, so much as wish to be exempted from ? ¹ 'Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see,' says our Saviour to his disciples, and in them, to all professors of his religion in succeeding generations : 'for I tell you, that many prophets and kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them ; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them.' But in vain were these great privileges conferred on us, unless we make an answerable improvement of them ; and far from blessed shall we be, when we come to appear before the dread tribunal, unless we endeavour ² 'in all things to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.'

SECT. V.

CHAP. I.—From the Ascension of Christ, to the Completion of the Canon of the New Testament in all about sixty-four Years.

THE HISTORY.

AFTER that our blessed Saviour was ascended out of sight, the apostles and other disciples still stood gazing up to heaven, till two angels in the shape of men, and gloriously apparelled, came, and informed them, that their Lord and Master, who was then departed into heaven, should at the great day of judgment, in the same visible manner, come again from thence ; whereupon they all returned to Jerusalem, full of joy and consolation ; and, being about an hundred and twenty in number, besides Mary the mother of our Lord, and some other pious women, who had attended him in his ministry, they there spent their time in acts of religious worship assembling daily in a certain upper room, "which they had made choice of for that purpose.

¹ Luke x. 23, 24.

² Titus ii. 10, 14.

a Some annotators are of opinion, that the upper room, where the apostles and other believers so frequently met together, was one of the chambers of the temple, which not only served for the use of the priests, but stood constantly open likewise for any religious assemblies. It is granted indeed, that in the temple there were several upper rooms ; but then, that they belonged to any besides the priests and Levites, is an assertion destitute of proof ; nor is it easy to conceive, how a company of poor fishermen and Galileans, who were odious to the priesthood for their Master's sake, should be permitted to come in such numbers as the sacred history takes notice of, and to hold their assemblies,

In one of these assemblies, St Peter reminding them, that the number of the apostles which our Lord had appointed was originally twelve, but that Judas, by his transgression, had forfeited that honour, thought proper to propose the choice of another person ^b to succeed in which were thought destructive to the established religion, within the verge of the temple. As, therefore, it was a thing very common among the Jews, to have their oratories, or private chapels, on the tops of their houses, where they generally met to read the law, and to treat of any religious matters ; so it is much more probable, that this was a room belonging to some private family, that were converts to the Christian faith, where, consequently, the apostles and other professors might meet to consult about the affairs of the church, and to pay their adorations to their heavenly Master, without fear of molestation : and, if conjectures may be allowed in matters of such uncertainty, it is not improbable that their customary place of meeting was at the house of Mary the mother of John, whose surname was Mark, because St Peter, upon his miraculous escape out of prison, is said to have gone directly thither, and there to have found several of his brethren gathered together, (Acts xii. 12.)—Eckard's Ecclesiastical History, Whitby's Annotations and Calnet's Commentary.

^b The words according to our translation, are these,—'That he might take part of the ministry and apostleship, from which Judas, by transgression, fell, that he might go to his own place, (Acts i. 25.)' These words, by different interpreters, have been referred both to Matthias and Judas. Those who refer them to Matthias say that they mean, that Judas fell that Matthias might 'go to his own place,' that is, to a place for which he was fitted, or well qualified. But to this there are many objections. 1. The apostolic office could with no propriety be called, in reference to Matthias, his own place, until it was actually conferred on him. 2. There is no instance in which the expression to go to his own place, is applied to a successor in office. 3. It is not true that the design or reason why Judas fell was to make way for another. He fell by his crimes ; his avarice, his voluntary and enormous wickedness. 4. The former part of the sentence contains this sentiment : 'Another must be appointed to this office which the death of Judas has made vacant.' If this expression, 'that he might go,' &c., refers to the successor of Judas, it expresses the same sentiment, but more obscurely. 5. The obvious and natural meaning of the phrase is to refer it to Judas. But those who suppose it to refer to Judas differ greatly about its meaning. Some suppose it refers to his own house ; that he left the apostolic office to return to his own house ; and they appeal to Numbers (xxiv. 25.) But it is not true that Judas did this ; nor is there the least proof that it was his design. Others refer to the grave, as the place of man, where all must lie ; and particularly as an ignominious place where Judas should lie. But there is no example of the word place being used in this sense : nor is there an instance where a man by being buried is said to return to his own or proper place. Others have supposed that the manner of his death, by hanging, is referred to, as his own or his proper place. But this interpretation is evidently an unnatural and forced one. The word place cannot be applied to an act of self-murder. It denotes habitation, abode, situation in which to remain ; not an act. These are the only interpretations which can be suggested of the passage, except the common and obvious one of referring it to the future abode of Judas in the world of woe. This might be said to be his own, as it was adapted to him ; as he had prepared himself for it : and as it was proper that he who had betrayed his Lord should remain there. This interpretation may be defended by the following considerations : 1. It is the obvious and natural meaning of the words. It commends itself by its simplicity, and its evident connexion with the context. It has in all ages been the common interpretation ; nor has any other been adopted unless there was a theory to be defended about future punishment. Unless men had previously made up their minds 'not to believe in future punishment,' no one would ever have thought of any other interpretation. This fact alone throws strong light on the meaning of the passage. 2. It accords with the crimes of Judas, and with all that we know of him. The future doom of Judas was not unknown to the apostles. Jesus Christ had expressly declared this ; 'it had been good for that man if he had not been born ;' a declaration which could not be true if, after any limited period of suffering, he were at his place; and especially such an one as had been familiarly conversant with our Saviour from first to last; that so he might be a competent witness both of his doctrines and miracles, his life and death, and especially his resurrection from the dead. This the company readily assented to; and having appointed Joseph, ^a surnamed Barsabas, and Matthias, ^b one of the seventy disciples, for the two candidates, they solemnly implored the divine direction in what they were going to do; and so drawing lots, elected Matthias, upon whom the lot fell, into the number of the twelve apostles.

A. M. 4027. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5444. A. D. 31. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

When the vacancy of the sacred college was thus filled up, the apostles and other disciples were all met together in their accustomed place, on the day of Pentecost: ^c when on a sudden, a prodigious noise, much last admitted to eternal happiness. This declaration was made in the presence of the eleven apostles, at the institution of the Lord's supper, at a time when their attention was absorbed with deep interest in what Christ said; and it was therefore a declaration which they would not be likely to forget. As they knew the fate of Judas, nothing was more natural for them than to speak of it familiarly as a thing which had actually occurred when he betrayed his Lord, hung himself, and went to his own place. ³ The expression 'to go to his own place,' is one which is used by the ancient writers to denote going to the eternal destiny. Thus the Jewish Tract, Baal Turim, on Num. xxiv. 25, says, 'Balaam went to his own place, that is, to Gehenna, to hell. Thus the Targum, or Chaldee Paraphrase on Eccl. vi. 6, says, 'Although the day's of a man's life were two thousand years, and he did not study the law, and do justice, in the day of his death his soul shall descend into hell, to the one place where all sinners go.' Thus Ignatius in the Epistle to the Magnesians, says, 'Because all things have an end, the two things death and life shall lie down together, and each one shall go to his own place.' The phrase his own place, means the place or abode which is fitted for him, which is his appropriate home. Judas was not in a place which befitted his character when he was an apostle; he was not in such a place in the church; he would not be in heaven. Hell was the only place which was fitted to the man of avarice and of treason.—Barnes on the Acts.—Ed.

^a It is not certainly known what the name Barsabas denotes. The Syriac word Bar means Son, and the word Sabas has been translated an oath, rest, quiet, or captivity. Why the name was given to Joseph is not known; but probably it was the family name—Joseph the son of Sabe. Some have conjectured that this was the same man who, in ch. vi. 36, is called Barnabas. But if this there is no proof. Lightfoot supposes that he was the son of Alphaeus, and brother of James the Less, and that he was chosen on account of his relationship to the family of the Lord Jesus. He was also called Justus. This is a Latin name, meaning just, and was probably given him on account of his distinguished integrity. It was not uncommon among the Jews for a man to have several names. (Mat. x. 3.)—Ibid.—Ed.

^b Nothing is known of the family of Matthias or of his character, further than that he was numbered with the apostles, and shared their lot in the toils, and persecutions, and honours of preaching the gospel to mankind.—Ibid.—Ed.

^c This word is derived from the Greek πεντηκοστή, which signifies the fiftieth, because the feast of Pentecost was celebrated the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of the month Nisan, which was the second day of the feast of the passover, (Lev. xxiii. 15, 16,) and for the same reason it is called the feast of weeks, because it was observed seven weeks after the passover, Deut. xvi. 9. It was at first instituted, in order to oblige the Jews to repair to the temple of the Lord, there to acknowledge his dominion and sovereignty over all their labours, and there to render thanks to him for the law which he gave them on the like day, namely, the fiftieth day after their departure out of Egypt. In like manner, the Christian church celebrates the feast of Pentecost fifty days, or seven weeks after the passover, or the resurrection of our blessed Saviour, to put us in remembrance, that the gifts of the Spirit were then poured out in a plentiful manner, as the first-fruits of our Saviour's ascension into heaven, and that the gospel began to be published by the apostles on the like the rushing of a loud impetuous wind, filled all the house where they were, and a kind of fiery vapour, or exhalation, formed into the figure of a man's tongue, but divided a little at the tip, sat on the head of each of them; whereupon they were all immediately filled with the Holy Ghost, ^d and, by its divine inspiration, began to speak in several different languages.

At this time, there were Jews of every quarter of the world sojourning in Jerusalem, besides proselytes, who, from almost all nations, came thither to the celebration of the feast: and no sooner did they hear of this miraculous event, but they began to wonder, not a little, how persons illiterate, and all born in the land of Galilee, should be able, with so much facility, to speak the languages of the several countries from whence they came; but others, who were willing to elude the force of the miracle, imputed their talking in this wild extravagant rate, as they called it, to the power and strength of new wine. ^e

Hereupon the apostles all stood up, and Peter, as president of the assembly, took upon him to confute this injurious calumny, by showing the audience, 'that then it was early in the morning, not above nine o'clock, and consequently no proper time to have eaten or drunk any thing; that the present effusion of the Holy Ghost, was a full completion of that famous prophecy same day that the ancient law was given to the Hebrews.—Calmet's Dictionary, Pool's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^d It is a question much debated whether the all here mentioned relates to the whole hundred and twenty, who are said to have been present at this time, (Acts i. 15,) or to the twelve apostles only: and in some measure to solve this, we may observe, that when the apostles came to appoint the seven deacons, they ordered the assembly to look out among them men full of the Holy Ghost, (Acts vi. 3,) which plainly implies, that there were several persons among them remarkable for such extraordinary gifts; yet we cannot suppose any time so proper for their reception of these gifts as this wonderful day of Pentecost. Nay, if the apostles themselves, by the imposition of their hands, could communicate the Holy Ghost to those whom they ordained ministers in particular churches; it seems unreasonable to think that such persons as had been constant companions of Christ and his apostles, and were to be the great preachers of the gospel in several parts of the world, should not, at this time, be endowed with the like gifts. So that from hence we may, with St Chrysostom, and others, be allowed to infer, that 'the Holy Ghost fell, not only upon the apostles but also upon the hundred and twenty that were in company with them.'—Whitby's Annotations.

^e As it was not at this time the season for new wine, those scoffers may be supposed to mean no more than any strong agreeable liquor, whether natural, or made by art. The ancients we are told, had a secret how to make a wine, which would preserve its sweetness all the year round, and which they generally used for a morning draught: 'it is proper to put only what is mild into empty veins, and it is best to wash the bowels with light methglin.' Hor. sat. ii. 4. But it seems incredible, that any men in their senses should think, that either wine, or any other liquor, should enable the apostles to speak all languages, and to declare the wonderful works of God. It is well conjectured therefore by our learned Lightfoot, that they who said this, were men of Judea, who, not understanding what the apostles spake in other languages, imagined that as drunken men are wont to do, they babbled some foolish gibberish, which they could make nothing of.—Calmet's Commentary, and Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

^f This was the ordinary time for their morning sacrifice and prayer, before which they never used to eat or drink any thing. Nay, on their festival days, it was customary with them not to eat or drink until the sixth hour, that is, noon time, that they might be more fit for, and intent upon the service of the day. And from this custom the apostle draws an argument, which, in those sober times, was thought to be conclusive.—Pool's Annotations.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5444. A. D. 31. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

in Joel,¹ where God had expressly promised it; that Jesus of Nazareth was the person who had poured down these extraordinary gifts upon his church; that from the testimony of holy David it plainly appeared, that God all along intended to raise him from the dead, and exalt him to his right hand; and that the present mission of the Holy Ghost abundantly declared, that the same person whom they, by divine permission, had crucified, God had ordained to be both Lord and Christ.⁷

This sermon, though the first that St Peter made in public, was so very moving to the audience, that it converted no less than three thousand souls; ^a who thereupon were received into the profession of the Christian faith by baptism; and by their diligent attention to the apostles' doctrine afterwards, their constant attendance on public prayers, their frequent celebration of the Lord's supper, their cheerful intercourse with one another, their parting with their goods and possessions, and communicating to every one according to their necessities, even to the love and admiration of all that beheld them, were daily and hourly confirmed therein.

Not long after this, as Peter and John, about ^b three o'clock in the afternoon, were going into the temple to pray, they saw a poor cripple, who was forty years old, and had been lame from his mother's womb, lying at the

¹ Joel ii. 21.

^a A quick and plentiful harvest this! But it is highly probable, that, as Peter preached to the Jews of Judea, in the Syrian tongue, the other apostles spake, at the same time, and to the same purpose, to the foreigners, in their respective languages; while the late sufferings of our Lord, the present miracle of languages, the authority of the speakers, and, above all, the efficacy of the Holy Spirit, contributed more than a little to this numerous conversion. The only question is, how such a multitude of converts could possibly be baptized in one day? To which some reply, that this rite of initiation into the Christian church was then performed by way of sprinkling as it is among us; but whoever looks into history will find, that the form of baptism among the Jews was plunging the whole body under water; and that, in conformity to them, the primitive Christians did, and the Eastern church, even to this day, does administer that sacrament in this manner. There is no necessity therefore for us to suppose, that all these proselytes to the Christian faith were baptized in one day. St Luke delivers in the gross what might possibly be transacted at several times; for it seems indeed expedient, that those new converts should be a little better instructed in the principles of their religion, and the apostles more fully convinced of the sincerity of their change, before they finally admitted them into the number of the saints.—Eckhard's Ecclesiastical History, and Calmel's Commentary.

^b Though, by the death of Jesus Christ, all sacrifices, and other things required in the ceremonial law, were utterly abolished, and a new covenant introduced; yet, for fear of offending the weak, and estranging them from his religion, our blessed Lord permitted his disciples to frequent the assemblies of the Jews, and, in some points, to comply with the observances of the law, until a more pure and spiritual form of worship could conveniently be established. This is the reason why we find the apostles so frequently in the temple at the stated hours of prayer; of which the Jews had three: the 1st, at the third hour of the day, which answers to our ninth, at which time they offered their morning sacrifice, (Exod. xxix. 39.) the 2d, at the sixth, that is, our twelve o'clock, either before or after dinner, at which time we find Peter praying, (Acts x. 9.) and the 3d, at the ninth, or our three in the afternoon, when they offered their evening-sacrifice, (Acts x. 30.) These stated hours, as the Rabbin tells us, they received from their three great patriarchs; that of the morning from Abraham, that of noon from Isaac, and that of the evening prayer from Jacob. However this be, it is certain, that the royal Psalmist makes mention of these three times, 'at evening, and at morning, and at noon, will I pray to thee,' (Psal. lv. 17.) and of David it is recorded, that he 'kneled

Beautiful-gate, ^c and begging an alms of those that went in. Silver and gold, as Peter told the man, he had none to give him, but, what was much more valuable, in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, he intended to heal him; and no sooner were the words spoken than the cure was effected. His joints were made straight, and his nerves became strong, so that he went along with the apostles into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God.

Every one knew that this was the person who had been the lame beggar at the temple-gate; and as he kept close by the two apostles, when the multitude, in much amazement, came flocking together to them in Solomon's porch, ^d St Peter took this occasion to inform them, 'that it was by the efficacy of the name of Jesus, whom they had crucified, but God had raised from the dead, and not by any power or holiness of their own, that this impotent man was made whole; that their crucifixion of Jesus was, in some measure, a sin of ignorance, but his rising again, and advancement to a celestial kingdom, a sure evidence of his being the promised Messiah; that the coming of such a Messiah, as well as the whole evangelical state, was all along foretold, not only by Moses, but by every prophet that succeeded him; and therefore, as they were the professed descendants of the prophets, and heirs of the covenant ratified with Abraham, God had made the first overtures of mercy to them, in hopes they would receive the gospel of his beloved Son, and repent of the iniquities which they had done unto him.'

This was the purport of St Peter's speech; and such was its efficacy, that it converted no less than five thousand of its hearers. But as the apostles were thus busied in instructing the people, at the instigation of the ^e priests and Sadducees, the captain of the temple came down three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks,' (Dan. iv. 10. 13.)—Camel's Commentary, and Whilby's Annotations.

^c Several of the gates, as Josephus tells us, were plated all over with gold and silver, post, front, and all; but this, which he calls the Corinthian gate, because it was made of Corinthian brass, did far surpass in glory those of gold and silver, being built with such art and sumptuousness, as well became the frontispiece of that place where the Divine Majesty vouchsafed to dwell.—Jewish Wars, b. vi. c. 6. and Whilby's Annotations.

^d Some are of opinion, that this porch, being one of those which Solomon built, had the fortune to escape, at least some part of it, when the Babylonians set fire to the temple; and that, though Herod the Great pulled it down, and rebuilt it in a more magnificent manner, it still retained its ancient name. It is certain, from Josephus, that the vast foundation of the east side of the court of the Gentiles, which Solomon built, was still subsisting in the time of the second temple; and as Herod, when he repaired that, made no alteration in this part of the work, the portico, or cloister, which, upon the old foundation, was built round this court, might, in memory of so great a prince, and first founder of the temple, still be called by Solomon's name;—Joseph. Jewish History, b. xv. c. 14. and Calmel's Commentary.

^e These were three different kinds of men, and, upon different accounts, prejudiced against the apostles. The priests were offended, because the apostles, whom they looked upon only as private men, undertook publicly to teach and instruct the people. The Sadducees were displeased, because, in testifying that Christ was risen, and become the first-fruits of them that slept, they effectually preached the resurrection of the dead; a doctrine which these men detested. And the captain, who was placed with a band of soldiers near the temple, in order to guard it, seeing such a crowd of people gather together about the apostles, began to be apprehensive of a tumult. But whether this captain was a Jew or a Roman, it is difficult to determine, unless we will acquiesce in what our learned Lightfoot, with some others,

A. M. 4037 A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5442. A. D. 31. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

suddenly upon them, seized them, and clapped them up in prison. The next morning the great Sanhedrim met; who having summoned the apostles before them, demanded of them, by what power they had wrought that miracle upon the lame man, and who it was that gave them authority to preach to the people? to which Peter, without the least hesitation, boldly replied, 'that their power and authority were both from Jesus of Nazareth, whom they had crucified, but God had raised him from the dead, and thereby declared him to be the Saviour of the world.'

The miracle was indisputable. The man who had received the cure was standing by the apostles, and ready to attest the fact, and therefore the council had nothing to object against it; only, after they had ordered the apostles to withdraw, and consulted together what was proper to be done upon this occasion, they called them in again, and, in hopes of awing them into silence, gave them strict charge, not to teach any more in the name of Jesus. But to this they made answer, 'That since they had received a command from heaven, to declare to all nations what they had heard or seen, it was certainly their duty to ^a obey God, rather than them.'

This was a fair appeal to the consciences of their very judges; but their judges, instead of being satisfied with it, would probably have proceeded to greater violence, had not the people's veneration for the apostles put a restraint upon their malice; all that they dared to do therefore was, to repeat and enforce their menaces, and so dismiss them. When the apostles were come to their brethren, and had reported to them the treatment they had met with, they all joined in prayer to God for a supply of courage and assistance extraordinary, in that trying and perilous juncture; and, at the conclusion of their prayer, the house where they were was shaken with a mighty wind, as before on the day of Pentecost; whereupon they were instantly replenished with fresh measures of the Holy Ghost, and notwithstanding all the threatenings of the Jewish rulers, found themselves invigorated to preach the gospel of Christ with more boldness and resolution than ever.

The charity at this time among believers was very large and extensive. Such of them as had houses, or possessions of any kind, sold them, and deposited the money in the hands of the apostles, by them to be distributed in due proportions, according to the necessities of their brethren. This a certain Levite, a native of seem to assert, viz. that the priests kept watch in three places of the temple, and the Levites in twenty-one; that to every one of these watches there was a chief, and to them all, one, who was eminently the ἀρχιερεύς, the 'captain, or ruler of the temple;' and that this captain is the very same, who, in Jewish writers, is so frequently called 'the man of the mount.' Whereupon he supposes, that this captain was an officer of the high priest's, appointed to bring those who any way offended in the temple, as the apostles were thought to do for having preached therein the doctrine of Christ, before the Sanhedrim, in order to be punished;—Cabinet's Commentary, Pool's and Whitby's Annotations.

^a Whether or no this was an axiom commonly received among the Jewish rabbins, and therefore very pertinently here applied by the apostles to their angry judges, this is certainly true, that Socrates answered his accusers in this manner, 'O ye Athenians, I will obey God rather than you; (Apol. p. 23.) and that Arius delivers this as a general precept, 'When thy superiors command thee any thing, thou must remember that there is one above, who sees thee, and that thou oughtest rather to please him than man;'—Whitby's Annotations.

Cyprus, ^b called Joses, but by the apostles surnamed Barnabas, or the Son of consolation, did with great readiness, and singleness of heart; ^c and in imitation of him, Ananias and his wife Sapphira, pretending to devote all they had to the service of the church, sold their estate, but making a reserve of some of the money to themselves, they brought only part of it into the public fund, hoping thereby to impose upon the apostles. By the spirit of prophecy, Peter however perceiving their deceit, rebuked them severely for it, and by the miraculous power wherewith he was then invested, struck them both dead upon the spot; thereby to inject terror into the rest of the believers, and thereby to prevent the like hypocrisy and dissimulation among them for the future.

Miracles of severity were not however much practised by the apostles: acts of mercy were their proper province, and healing the diseased, and freeing the possessed, a great part of their employment; wherein the divine power so far attended them, that even the shadow of Peter passing by, cured the sick; who, in the very streets, were laid on beds and couches, on purpose to receive the benefit of his salutary influence. Nor were these marvellous cures confined to the inhabitants of Jerusalem only, but the people of the several neighbour-

^b A large island of the Mediterranean, about 100 miles from the coast of Syria, and 60 from that of Cilicia, in Asia Minor. It is 200 miles in length and 60 at its greatest breadth; and had once many considerable cities. Cyprus was famous in the times of the Greeks and Romans for the worship paid to Venus; whence her title of Cyprian; a name still given to certain modern and abandoned votaries of that goddess. But a higher honour was paid to this island by the visit of St Paul, and the subversion of its heathen abominations by the planting of Christianity. (Acts xiii.) This was also the birthplace of Barnabas, who accompanied Paul in his travels. Cyprus, originally governed by several petty kings, after having shared in most of the fortunes of the East, by passing through the hands of the Persians, Greeks, Romans, and Saracens, is at present in possession of the Turks; and, like most other of their possessions, from having been a populous and flourishing country, is reduced to a barren desert. The Rev. James Comor visited Cyprus in 1820; and was received in the kindest manner by the Greek Archbishop, who is the political as well as spiritual head of the Greeks in the island. He is also independent of any patriarch; and is the only one of all the ecclesiastical dignitaries who is empowered to wear a purple robe, to carry a sceptre, and to sign his papers with red ink. The island contains about 40,000 Greeks, 14,000 Turks, 500 Maronites; and has forty Greek monasteries, with about 300 monks; and two Catholic convents, with six fathers; but no Jews.—Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer.—See also Wood's Progress of Christianity, p. 115.—Ed.

^c Though Barnabas was a Levite, he might have had land of his own by private purchase. The Levites, as a tribe, had no land in Israel; but the individuals certainly might make purchases any where in the country: but, as Barnabas was of Cyprus, his land probably lay there; and as it is likely that he was one of those strangers that came up to Jerusalem to the late feast, and was there converted, he might have sold his land in the island to some of his own countrymen who were at Jerusalem at this time; and so, being called to the work of the ministry, continued to associate with the apostles, travelling every where, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God. He was the constant companion of St Paul, till the separation took place on account of John Mark, mentioned chap. xv. 36—39. It is worthy of remark that the two apostles of the Gentiles, though of Jewish extraction, were both born in Gentile countries; Paul in Cilicia, Barnabas in Cyprus: this gave them many advantages; served to remove prejudices from the heathens; and gave them no doubt much facility in the Greek tongue, without which they could have done but little in Asia Minor, or in most parts of the Roman empire where they travelled. How admirably does God determine even the place of our birth, and the bounds of our habitation.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5444. A. D. 31. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

ing towns and villages brought thither their sick, their lame, and possessed, who from the hands of the apostles never once missed of a cure.

Provoked at the fame of these cures, and at the success which they saw Christianity gaining by the miracles and preaching of the apostles, the high-priest, and some others of the Sanhedrim, who were of the sect of the Sadducees, had them apprehended, and thrown into the common prison. But the next night an angel from heaven, having set them at liberty, encouraged them to proceed with boldness in their ministry, and ordered them even to go the next morning, and preach the doctrine of Christ in the midst of the temple; which accordingly they failed not to do. ^a

In the morning the council being met, sent their officers to bring the apostles before them; but were not a little surprised, when the officers returned, and told them, that they found the doors of the prison shut indeed, and the keepers all upon their guard, but as for the persons whom they were sent for, there was not one of them to be found. This report put the whole court in great perplexity, until word was brought them, that the prisoners whom they wanted were preaching in the temple: whereupon the captain of the guard, with some other officers, went and intreated them to come before the council, not daring to offer any violence to them, for fear of being stoned by the people.

When the apostles were brought before their judges, and the high-priest demanded of them, how they durst presume to preach a doctrine which so lately had been interdicted them, they returned much the same answer that they had done once before, namely, 'That they were bound to obey God rather than man; that Jesus whom they had murdered, was undoubtedly the true Messiah; and that of his resurrection, and ascension into heaven, both they, and the Holy Ghost, whereby they acted, were authentic witnesses.' Which so exasperated the high-priest, and some other of the rulers, that, upon their ordering them to withdraw, their first resolution was, to have put them to death. But this was prevented by the wise advice of a certain Pharisee, named Gamaliel, ^b who, from some,

^a The Lord brought the apostles out of prison, not for the purpose of delivering them from the hands of their enemies, for he afterwards suffered them to be brought back before the council and beaten with rods; but he wished to show by the miracle, that they were under his care and protection, in order that they might vindicate and establish the truth of the gospel; partly that the church might thence receive an accession of strength, and partly that every ground of excuse might be removed from wicked men. Wherefore we ought not always to hope, or even to wish that God would deliver us from death, but we ought to rest contented with this one consideration that our life is under his special protection, in so far as he sees it expedient.—Calvin.—Ed.

^b This was the Gamaliel at whose feet Paul was brought up, (Acts xxii. 3.) and some of the ancients are of opinion, that he was tutor likewise to other apostles, Barnabas and Stephen; and for this reason it is reported of him, that when that proto-martyr suffered, he encouraged the Christians to go by night, and carry off his body, for which purpose he lent them his chariot, and allowed them a burying place in his own estate, about eight leagues distant from Jerusalem. He certainly was a doctor of great repute among the Jews, and was therefore usually called Rabbin Gamaliel, a title of the highest eminence, and never given, say they, to any more than seven. He is supposed to have been the grandson of Hillel, and either uncle or cousin to Nicodemus, of whom we read in the gospel, (John iii. 1.) &c., for thirty-two years to have continued the Nasi, or president of the Sanhedrim; and to have died about ten years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Christian authors make no doubt but that he embraced the faith of Jesus, but at what time he became a convert, or by whose hands he was baptized, they no where tell us. To reconcile his conversion, however, with what the Jewish writers relate of his being at the head of the Sanhedrim so long, they affirm, that he was a Christian even when that assembly sat upon the apostles, and that the apostles persuaded him to continue in it, and not to discover his religion, that thereby he might be capable of doing more service to the church. But the author of the Acts has noted the true reason of his speaking in favour of the apostles, namely, that as the Sadducees, after our Lord's resurrection, became the apostles' greatest enemies, because they 'preached through Christ the resurrection of the dead, (Acts iv. 2.) so Gamaliel, who was a Pharisee, and consequently a stiff assessor of the resurrection, did therefore give his advice for the dismissal of the apostles; even as we find the Pharisees afterwards, almost in the same words, pleading for St Paul preaching the same doctrine, namely, that they ought not to molest him in what he did, 'lest they should be found fighters against God,' (Acts xxiii. 9.)—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

The great increase of believers, and access of money to the common fund for the relief of their poor, made the institution of another order of men in the Christian church highly necessary. For when the Hellenists ^c complained that in the distribution of the charity money, an undue preference was given to the Hebrew widows, whilst theirs were too frequently neglected, the apostles, who had matters of greater importance upon their hands, vert, or by whose hands he was baptized, they no where tell us. To reconcile his conversion, however, with what the Jewish writers relate of his being at the head of the Sanhedrim so long, they affirm, that he was a Christian even when that assembly sat upon the apostles, and that the apostles persuaded him to continue in it, and not to discover his religion, that thereby he might be capable of doing more service to the church. But the author of the Acts has noted the true reason of his speaking in favour of the apostles, namely, that as the Sadducees, after our Lord's resurrection, became the apostles' greatest enemies, because they 'preached through Christ the resurrection of the dead, (Acts iv. 2.) so Gamaliel, who was a Pharisee, and consequently a stiff assessor of the resurrection, did therefore give his advice for the dismissal of the apostles; even as we find the Pharisees afterwards, almost in the same words, pleading for St Paul preaching the same doctrine, namely, that they ought not to molest him in what he did, 'lest they should be found fighters against God,' (Acts xxiii. 9.)—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^c Some are of opinion, that these Hellenists, or Grecians, as our translations render them, were originally Gentiles, first converted to the Jewish, and afterwards to the Christian religion, even as the Hebrews here mentioned were originally Jews. But though it be allowed, that Gentiles of all nations are frequently called 'Hellenes,' yet it no where appears that they are styled 'Hellenists.' And that these Grecians must mean something different from the common Hellenes, or Greeks, is evident from the case of St Paul, who when he came to Jerusalem, and disputed πρὸς τοὺς Ἑλλήνιστας 'against the Grecians, they went about to kill thee,' (Acts ix. 29.) whereas had they been strangers of other nations, they durst not have attempted to kill a Jew among a nation of Jews, without bringing him to their tribunal. It is reasonable therefore to believe, that these Hellenists were originally Jews, and descended from such as, in the several calamities that befel the Jewish state, were either forced, or chose to leave their own country: and settling at Alexandria, and other places where only the Greek tongue was spoken, in process of time came to forget their own, and to make use of the Greek only, both in their common conversation and religious offices. Of this kind of Jews, we are told, there were great numbers in Jerusalem, where there was a synagogue particularly appointed for such as understood no other language than Greek, and where the version of the LXX. was constantly read in their assemblies. As therefore the apostles had hitherto made no tender of the gospel to the Gentiles, the Hellenists here spoken of must necessarily mean such Jews, converted to the Christian religion, as had disused the Hebrew or Syriac, and spake the Greek language only.—Calmet's Commentary, Whitby's and Pool's Annotations.

A. M. 4038. A. D. 34, OR A. M. 5445. A. D. 34, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

and were not at leisure to attend on this affair themselves, called the church together, and having ordered them to single out seven ^a men of great repute for their wisdom and prudence, as well as spiritual endowments, to be chosen stewards of the public stock; these they ordained to the office of deacons, by the solemnity of prayers, and the imposition of their hands. ^b ^c The names of the persons who were ordained to this office, were Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenus, and Nicholas, all taken out of the number of the seventy disciples whom our Lord had chosen; but of these the most eminent for the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit was Stephen.

He preached the gospel with a noble courage and resolution, and confirmed it with many public and unquestionable miracles among the people, inasmuch that by his means the Christian religion gained ground abundantly. Converts came in apace; and great numbers of the priests themselves laid aside their prejudices, and embraced the gospel. ^d This zeal and success of his,

^a The words in the text are these,—‘Wherefore brethren, look ye out among you seven men, of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business, Acts vi. 3. Though they were selected by the church, yet the power of ordaining them, or setting them apart, was retained by the apostles. Thus the rights of both were preserved, the right of the church to designate those who should serve them in the office of deacon, and the right of the apostles to organise and establish the church with its appropriate officers: on the one hand, a due regard to the liberty and privileges of the Christian community, and on the other, the security of proper respect for the offices as being of apostolic appointment and authority.—Barnes on the Acts—Ed.

^b Selden and Wolf deduce the origin of laying on hands from the age of Moses, advertising to the seven seniores, on whom Moses laid his hands (Num. xxvii. 18.). Hence the custom obtained in the Jewish church, and was thence introduced into the Christian. As laying on of hands had always been used in praying for the good of any person present, in order to show for whom the benefit was entreated, so it was also from the earliest ages a rite of institution to office, which it confirmed by symbol.—Bloomfield’s Greek Testament.—Ed.

^c The names of these seven deacons, we may observe, are all of Greek extract: from whence we may infer, that very probably they were all Hellenists; and that consequently, by their designation, the church was desirous to give full satisfaction to the complaint of those whose widows had been before neglected. Of the two first of these, namely, Stephen and Philip, the sacred history has given us a sufficient account; but of the rest we have nothing certain; except we will admit of what the Latins tell us of Prochorus, namely, that on the 9th of August, he suffered martyrdom at Antioch, after having made himself famous for his miracles; of Nicanor, that on the 10th of January, he suffered in the isle of Cyprus, after having given great demonstrations of his faith and virtue; of Timon, that on the 19th of April, he was first thrown into the fire, and when he had miraculously escaped from thence, was fixed upon a cross at Corinth; of Parmenus, that on the 23d of January, he suffered at Philippus in Macedonia; and of Nicholas, that either by design or indiscretion, he gave rise to the infamous sect of Nicolaitans, and therefore no Christian church has ever yet paid any honour to his memory. One thing we may observe in this place, namely, that much about the time of the institution of these deacons, James, the Less, so called to distinguish him from the other James, who was the son of Zebedee, and for his eminent virtues sur-named the Just, was chosen bishop of Jerusalem, and for this reason preferred before all the rest, because he was a near relation, namely, a co-in-german, to our blessed Saviour.—Culmet’s Commentary and Dictionary; and Fleury’s Ecclesiastical History.

^d We learn from Ezra, (chap. iii. 36.—39.) that four thousand two hundred and eighty-nine priests returned from the captivity, the number of which was now probably much increased.—I see no foundation in the authority of any ancient copies, for reading with Casaubon, καὶ τῶν ἱερέων, and explaining it as if it were καὶ however, soon awakened the malice of his adversaries to procure some members ^e of the most learned synagogues then in Jerusalem, to dispute with him: but when they found their disputants baffled, and unable to withstand the force of those arguments which the divine wisdom inspired him with, they betook themselves to vile practices; and having procured men of profligate consciences to accuse him of blasphemy, caused him to be apprehended, and, in a tumultuous manner, brought him before the Sanhedrim, in order to obtain a formal sentence of condemnation against him.

Whilst he stood before the council, the judges, and all the people then present, beheld a lustre and radiancy in his countenance, not unlike the appearance of an angel; and when he was indulged the liberty of speech, in a grave and severe oration, he endeavoured, not only to vindicate himself from the imputation of blasphemy, but, at the same time, by an historical deduction of the most memorable actions and events that had happened in the Jewish nation, from the time of Abraham to that of Solomon, he undertook to show, ‘That religion was not confined to the holy land, or the temple-service; that the law, for which they expressed so vehement a zeal, was unable to contain mankind within the bounds of their duty; that as their forefathers were all along a stubborn τῆς; τῶν ἱερῶν, and some of the priests. It is indeed wonderful that a great multitude of them should embrace the gospel, considering what peculiar resentments they must expect from their unbelieving brethren, and the great losses to which they must be exposed in consequence of being cast out of their office; as it is not to be imagined, that when Christians were cast out of the synagogue, they would be retained as temple-ministers: but the grace of God was able to animate and support them against all. And it is very probable the miracle of rending the veil of the temple, and the testimony of the guards to the truth of the resurrection, which some of the chief of that order heard and might perhaps be whispered to some others, might contribute considerably toward their conversion, in concurrence with the miraculous gifts and powers of the apostles, the most convincing proofs of which they saw before their eyes in their own temple.—Doddridge’s Expositor.—Ed.

^e There has been very great difference of opinion about the meaning of this word. The chief opinions may be reduced to three. 1. The word is Latin, and means properly a freedman, a man who had been a slave and was set at liberty. And many have supposed, that these persons were manumitted slaves, of Roman origin, but which had become proselyted to the Jewish religion, and who had a synagogue in Jerusalem. This opinion is not very probable; though it is certain, from Tacitus (Annal. b. ii. c. 85.), that there were persons of this description at Rome. He says that four thousand Jewish proselytes or Roman slaves made free were sent at one time to Sardinia. 2. A second opinion is, that these persons were Jews by birth, and had been taken captives by the Romans, and then set at liberty, and thus called freedmen or libertines. That there were many Jews of this description there can be no doubt. Pompey the Great when he subjugated Judea, sent large numbers of the Jews to Rome. (Philo in Legat. ad Caium.) These Jews were set at liberty at Rome, and assigned a place beyond the Tiber for a residence. See introduction to the Epistle to the Romans. These persons are by Philo called libertines, or freedmen. (Kuinöel in loco.) Many Jews were also conveyed as captives by Ptolemy I. to Egypt, and obtained a residence in that country and the vicinity. But 3. Another and more probable opinion is, that they took their name from some place which they occupied. This opinion is more probable from the fact that all the other persons mentioned here are named from the countries which they occupied. Suidas says that this is the name of a place. And in one of the Fathers this passage occurs: ‘Victor bishop of the Catholic church at Libertina, says, unity is there,’ &c. From this passage it is plain that there was a place called Libertina. That place was in Africa, not far from ancient Carthage.—See Bishop Pearce’s Comment. on this place.—Barnes on the Acts.—Ed.

A. M. 4038. A. D. 33; OR, A. M. 5445. A. D. 34, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

and rebellious people, and grievous persecutors of the prophets, who were sent to foretell the coming of the Messiah, so were they likewise a wicked and perverse generation, who in all things had equalled, but in this surpassed, the impiety of their ancestors, namely, that, contrary to that law which had been delivered to them by the ministry of angels, they had betrayed and murdered that very person who was sent into the world to fulfil it.^a

These last words, which were but too true, incensed the Jews to such a degree, that they fell upon him with the utmost expressions of their rage and fury; whilst he, regardless of what they were about, had his mind employed in the ^b delightful prospect of heaven, and the sensible appearance of the blessed Jesus, in our glorified nature, standing at the right-hand of God; which when he had declared to all the company, the Jews were

^a There has been great diversity of opinion about the object which Stephen had in view in this defence, and about the reason why he introduced at such length the history of the Jewish people. But a few remarks may perhaps show his design. He was accused of blasphemy in speaking against the institutions of Moses and the temple, that is, against every thing held sacred among the Jews. To meet this charge, he gives a statement, at length, of his belief in the Mosaic religion, in the great points of their history, and in the fact that God had interposed in a remarkable manner in defending them from dangers. By this historical statement he avows his full belief in the divine origin of the Jewish religion, and thus indirectly repels the charge of blasphemy. It is further to be remembered, that this was the best way of securing the attention of the council. Had he entered on an abstract defence, he might expect to be stopped by their cavils or their clamour. But the history of their own nation was a favourite topic among the Jews. They were always ready to listen to an account of their ancestors; and to secure their attention, nothing more was necessary than to refer to their illustrious lives and deeds. Comp. Ps. lxxviii. ev. evi. cxxxv. Ezek. xx. In this way Stephen secured their attention, and practically repelled the charge of speaking reproachfully of Moses and the temple. He showed them that he had as firm a belief as they in the great historical facts of their nation. It is to be remembered, also, that this speech was broken off in the midst (ver. 53, 54.), and it is therefore difficult to tell what the design of Stephen was. It seems clear, however, that he intended to convict them of guilt, by showing that they sustained the same character as their fathers had manifested (ver. 51, 52.) and there is some probability that he intended to show that the acceptable worship of God was not to be confined to any place particularly, from the fact that the worship of Abraham, and the patriarchs, and Moses, was acceptable before the temple was reared (ver. 2, &c.), and from the declaration in ver. 48, that God dwells not in temples made with hands. All that can be said here is, that Stephen (1.) showed his full belief in the divine appointment of Moses, and the historical facts of their religion; (2.) That he laid the foundation of an argument to show that those things were not perpetually binding, and that acceptable worship might be offered in other places and in another manner than at the temple.—Barnes.—See also Bloomfield's Crit. Digest.—Ed.

^b Whether to afford St Stephen this delightful prospect, the opening of the heavens was real, (as it is believed to have been at our Lord's baptism,) or whether this, like other appearances to the prophets of the Old Testament, was represented to him by way of vision, as we cannot certainly know, so it is of no great consequence that we should, for, since a vision is described by those that are particularly curious in these matters, to be such a distinct and strong impression upon the faculty of the imagination, as sets the object before the man, as plainly as if it actually was present, and perceived by his bodily senses, [Maim. Mor. Nev. part ii. c. 26.] it is not to be doubted, but that either of these ways comes all to one, as to the certainty of the persuasion, and every other effect which we can suppose it is intended to produce in the mind of the person whom it actuates.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.

so enraged, that, raising a loud clamour, and stopping their ears against all cries for mercy, they unanimously rushed upon him, dragged him out of the city, and there stoned him to death; whilst he, having first devoutly recommended his soul to God, upon his bended knees, made loud intercession for his murderers, that the sin they were then committing might not be laid to their charge; and so gave up the ghost: but his body was buried by devout men, (probably proselytes to the Christian faith,) who made great lamentations over it.

Among the many that were thus enraged against Stephen, one particular person, who had but too great a hand in his death, was a young man of Cilicia, named Saul. He out of his great officiousness to have him executed, undertook to look to the clothes of the witnesses, who usually stripped themselves to throw the first stones, as the law directed, at the person who died by their evidence; and, out of his passionate concern for the traditions of the ancients, having procured a commission from the Sanhedrim, he immediately put it into execution. For he broke open houses, seized upon all who looked like the disciples of Jesus, and, without any regard to sex or age, scourged and hauled them away to prison, compelling them to blaspheme and deny Christ, and breathing out nothing but threatenings and slaughter wherever he came; insomuch that most of the believers, except the apostles,^d were forced to leave Jerusalem, and disperse themselves in the regions of Judea and Samaria, Syria and Phœnicia, Cyprus and Antioch, &c. preaching the gospel to the Jews that were in those places.

Among those who were thus dispersed, Philip the deacon, the second in order after Stephen, came to Samaria,^e where, by his preaching and miracles, he con-

^c In this prayer of our dying martyr, there are these four things observable. (1.) That he looked upon his soul as a substance distinct from his body; and, (2.) That it continued to exist after its separation from the body. (3.) That he declared our blessed Saviour to be God omniscient, and omnipotent, able to hear and grant his prayer, and to preserve the souls committed to his care and protection. And, (4.) That the spirits received by him are in a state of safety and happiness. The time of this martyrdom is, by some, placed after our Lord's death, about eight months; by others, at the distance of about four; by others again, seven years. Eusebius is express, that it followed quickly after his election into the office of deacon. From St Chrysostom, and some others, who speak in his honour, we are to conclude, that he was martyred young; and from ecclesiastical history we are informed, that the place where he suffered, had a stately church built upon it by Eudocia, the empress, wife to Theodosius.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. i.

^d It is a very ancient tradition, mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria, that our Lord assigned twelve years after his ascension, for the conversion of the unbelieving Jews in Judea, lest any of them should say, that they 'had not heard of the glad tidings of the gospel;' and Apollonius, who flourished at the same time, speaks of this ὡς ἐν παραδύσει, as delivered by tradition, that our Lord commanded his apostles, 'not to depart out of Jerusalem for the space of twelve years;' which, if there be any truth in it, shows the reason why the apostles continued at Jerusalem, when the rest of the disciples were scattered abroad.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e This does not mean a city whose name was Samaria, for no such city at that time existed. Samaria was a region. (Mat. i. 22.) The ancient city Samaria, the capital of that region, had been destroyed by Hyrcanus, so completely as to leave no vestige of it remaining; and therefore he 'took away,' says Josephus, 'the very marks that there had ever been such a city there.' (Antiq. b. xiii. ch. x. sect. 3.) Herod the Great afterwards built a city on this site, and called it Sebaste, that is, Augusta, in honour of the emperor Augustus. (Jos. Antiq. b. xv. ch.

A. M. 4038. A. D. 34; OR, A. M. 5445. A. D. 34, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

verted many. In this place there was one Simon,^a who, by his sorcery and magical arts, had so strangely gained the veneration of the people, that they looked upon his diabolical illusions, as real operations of the power of God; but seeing great numbers of his admirers fall off from him, and embrace the doctrines which Philip preached, he, in like manner, pretended to be a convert, and, in hopes of obtaining some share of the miraculous gifts, which he could not but admire in the apostle, desired by him to be baptized.

The news of the conversion of so large a city as Samaria was soon brought to the apostles at Jerusalem; who thereupon sent Peter and John to confer the gifts of the Holy Ghost upon the new converts. The magician, perceiving that a power of working miracles, and speaking with tongues, was consequent upon the imposition of the apostles' hands, offered to give them money to enable him to do the like. But the offer St Peter rejected with scorn and detestation, denouncing an execration against him and his money; which so terrified the crafty, that, possibly fearing to be made an example of dissimulation, as Ananias was, he begged the apostles' prayers to God for the pardon of his sin, and the aversion of those judgments which his denunciation seemed to portend. But how false and feigned his repentance was, the sequel of this history will show.

viii. sect. 5.) Perhaps this city is intended, as being the principal city of Samaria; or possibly Sychar, another city where the gospel had been before preached by the Saviour himself. (John iv.)—Barnes on the Acts.—Ed.

^a This man was a native of Gitten, a village of Samaria, and a pretended convert to Christianity; but, upon his being rejected by the apostles, he soon turned apostate, and being a man of an ambitious and daring temper, in pure revenge, set himself in opposition to them, and became the first broacher of several abominable heresies. The account indeed, which according to St Luke, this magician gives of himself is only this—That he was μύσας τις, some great person, as mountebanks usually represent themselves, and the opinion which his magical pranks had wrought among the Samaritans, only this—That he was the great power of God; by which words perhaps he only meant some legate or minister of God, assisted by his mighty power: and yet from these words very probably, the fathers tell us, that he declared himself to be the prime God; the God above all principality, power, and virtue whatever; and that to the Samaritans, he was the Father; to the Jews, the Son; and to other nations, the Holy Ghost. But, since the history of the apostles informs us, that he believed, and was baptized in the name of Jesus, it is difficult to conceive, how he should persuade the Samaritans, that he was God the Father; or the Jews, that he was the Son, or that Jesus into whose name he was baptized, or the Gentiles, that he was that Spirit which he would have purchased with money. And therefore we may presume, that these venerable writers, out of their ardent zeal against this arch heretic, might be induced to magnify his arrogant pretensions above measure, by putting too strong an interpretation upon St Luke's words. However this be, it is certain, that he did not acknowledge Jesus Christ as the Son of God, but looked upon him as a rival, and pretended himself to be the Christ; that he held the world was not created by God, but made by angels, and therefore divine honours were due to them, as appointed mediators between God and men; that he accounted the ordinary worship of idols as a thing indifferent, and in times of persecution, that men might lawfully abjure the Christian faith; that he maintained an universal licence to sin, men might act as they were inclined, women might be in common, and that to press the observance of good works was inconsistent with the gospel-liberty. These were some of his principles; and in consequence of these, as Irenæus tells us, he and his followers lived in all lust and impurity, and wallowed in the most horrible and unheard-of bestiality.—Calmel's Dissertation on Simon the Magician; Echard's Ecclesiastical History, and Cave's Life of St Paul.

The two apostles, having thus confirmed the church of Samaria, preached the gospel in many of the neighbouring villages with good success, and so returned to Jerusalem; while Philip, being ordered by an angel who appeared to him, to go southward into the road which led from Jerusalem to Gaza, ^b he there met with an eunuch ^c that waited on Candace ^d Queen of Ethiopia, who had been to pay his devotions at Jerusalem, ^e and ^b The city of Gaza is mentioned in Acts viii. 26. with the parenthetical remark,—that αὐτὴ ἐστὶν ἔρημος—it [or the same] is desert; which has greatly exercised the ingenuity of commentators, some of whom refer αὐτὴ to ἰδὼς, and translate it by unfrequented; while others, referring it to the city, explained it by deprived of fortifications; others again suppose the ancient city to have remained desolate, and that which flourished in the days of St Luke to have occupied a somewhat different site nearer to the sea; and others consider these words to be a mere gloss which has found its way into the text. A passage, however, in Josephus, which has escaped the researches of most of the learned men, clears up the difficulty, and shows the minute fidelity of the sacred historian. A short time before the siege of Jerusalem, in consequence of a massacre of the Jews at Casarea, the whole nation became greatly enraged, and in revenge laid waste many villages and cities; and among these were Anthedon and Gaza, which they utterly demolished. Gaza therefore was actually ἔρημος, a desert, at the time St Luke wrote.—Josephus, Jew. War, b. ii. c. 18. sect. 1. Hug's Introd. vol. i. p. 25.—For an account of Gaza, ancient and modern, see note (a), p. 413 of this work.—Ed.

^c This word is derived from the Greek εὐνούχος, which signifies one who guards the bed; because generally, in the courts of the eastern kings, the care of the beds and apartments belonging to princes and princesses was committed to them; but more especially those of the princesses, who, in these countries, live in great retirement, and remote from the sight and company of men. It is not to be denied, however, that this word is in Scripture frequently set to signify any minister belonging to a prince, attending at his court, and employed more especially in some office belonging to the inner part of the palace, whether he be really an eunuch or not. Thus Potiphar, though he was married, is called in the Septuagint version of Gen. xxxvii. 36. σπαδὸν Φαραὼ (the word, σπαδων, Lat. spado, having the same import as eunuch.) and in Gen. xxxix. 1. he is called εὐνούχος Φαραὼ, 'the eunuch of Pharaoh.' Hence it is most probable that this Ethiopian was not a eunuch in the strict sense of the term, but merely a court officer, or rather treasurer of Candace. It does not appear, as some have imagined, that the Abyssinians were converted to the Christian faith by this eunuch, nor by any of the apostles; as there is strong historic evidence that they continued Jews and Pagans for more than three hundred years after the Christian era. Their conversion is with great probability attributed to Frumentinus, sent to Abyssinia for that purpose by Athanasias, bishop of Alexandria, about A. D. 330.—See Bruce.—Ed.

^d In the time of our Saviour (and indeed from that time forward,) by Ethiopia, was meant, in a general sense, the countries south of Egypt, then but imperfectly known; of one of which, that Candace was queen, whose eunuch was baptized by Philip. Mr Bruce, on his return from Abyssinia, found in latitude 16° 38' a place called Chendi, where the reigning sovereign was then a queen; and where a tradition existed, that a woman, by name Hendaquë (which comes as near as possible to the Greek name Χαδακη), once governed all that country. Near this place are extensive ruins, consisting of broken pedestals and obelisks, which Bruce conjectures to be those of Meroë, the capital of the African Ethiopia; which is described by Herodotus as a great city in his time, namely, 400 years before Christ: and where, separated from the rest of the world by almost impassable deserts, and enriched by the commercial expeditions of their travelling brethren, the Cushites continued to cultivate, so late as the first century of the Christian era, some portion of those arts and sciences to which the settlers in the cities had always more or less devoted themselves.—Mansford's Gazetteer, art. Cush.—Ed.

^e That this eunuch was a proselyte of justice, or one who, from paganism had embraced the Jewish faith, to which he might be converted by those Jews who, from Alexandria, spread them-was then upon his journey home. As he drew near to the chariot, Philip found him commendably employed in reading a passage in the 53d chapter of Isaiah, relating to the sufferings of the Messiah: and, when the treasurer expressed his desire of having the passage, which he did not so well understand, a little explained to him, ^a and thereupon invited him into the chariot, Philip took this opportunity to preach unto him the gospel of Jesus Christ, and thereby to show him, that not only the sense of that passage, but of several others in the ancient prophets, was fully accomplished in his person and transactions. This so fully convinced the eunuch, that, with much eagerness, he desired to be baptized into the Christian faith; which, when Philip had done, the Spirit of the Lord immediately transported him to Azotus, ^b from whence he proceeded as far as Casarea, ^c preach-sels into the African Ethiopia, is a reasonable conjecture, not only because he came so long a journey to worship at Jerusalem, probably at some great festival, but because Cornelius is expressly declared to be the first-fruits of the Gentiles; and, it is not unlikely, that the fame which he had heard at Jerusalem, of the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ, might be the reason of his reading the prophet Isaiah, who speaks more plainly of the times of the gospel than any other, and that particular chapter, which (as Arabinell testifies) all the Jewish rabbins did, with one mouth, confess, that it related to the sufferings of Messiah the king.—Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4039. A. D. 35; OR, A. M. 5446. A. D. 35, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

^a It certainly does not follow that because this nobleman wanted an interpreter of a prophecy which was obscure to him, we must want also an unerring guide; and therefore this passage does not prove the necessity of an infallible interpreter, as the Romanists pretend; but it does prove, first, The advantage of authorized and competent teachers; and, secondly, The duty of applying to them for instruction. Let all devout Christians diligently read the holy Scriptures like this Ethiopian grandee, and with the same humble and teachable disposition seek for edification at the hands of the authorized interpreters of the word of God. With ver. 32. comp. Isa. liii. 7, 8.—Holden's Christ. Expositor, Acts viii. 31.

^b That it was a common thing for the Spirit of God to convey his prophets of old from one place to another, as it were in an instant of time, is plain from Obadiah's words to Elijah, 'It shall come to pass, that, as soon as I am gone from thee, the Spirit of the Lord shall carry thee where I know not,' (1 Kings xviii. 12.) and from what the sons of the prophets say to Elisha, 'Let these men, we pray thee, go, and seek thy master; lest peradventure the Spirit of the Lord hath taken him up, and cast him upon some mountain,' (2 Kings ii. 16.) This very probably might be done by the ministry of some angel, here called 'the Spirit, or power of the Lord.' And the reason that is commonly assigned for it, in the case of Philip, is, That the eunuch had requested of him to go with him into Ethiopia; whereas God, having designed him to preach the gospel in other parts of the world, removed him in this extraordinary manner; and thereby not only prevented his compliance with the request, but gave the eunuch assurance likewise of his being a messenger sent from heaven; and, consequently, that the things which had been taught him, were true.—Calmet's Commentary, Whitby's and Pool's Annotations. According to Bloomfield, the meaning of Acts viii. 39. is, that Philip went away quickly under the directions and influence of the Spirit, but was not transported in a miraculous manner. See his note on the passage.—Greek Test.—Ed.

^c This city is in the Old Testament called Ashdod. The Greeks gave it the name of Azotus, the Arabs called it Mezdel, and the Syrians Ezdoud. It stands on the summit of a grassy hill, near the coast of the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Joppa. This was one of the five cities of the Philistines; and is memorable for having sustained the longest siege mentioned in history, when Psammetichus, king of Egypt, took it after a siege of 29 years. It is represented as having been a place of great strength, and sustaining repeated sieges from the kings of Egypt and Assyria: by both of whom it was desired as a frontier town. It was made an episcopal see by the early Christians, and is described ing the gospel in all the cities, while the Ethiopian pursued his journey with great joy and satisfaction of mind.

The dispersion of believers, which occasioned a propagation of the gospel in other countries, soon excited the furious zeal of Saul to procure proper letters ^d of authority from the high-priest of Damascus, ^e that in case he should find any there, whether they were men or women, professing the Christian faith, he might bring them bound to Jerusalem, there to be punished. But as he was upon the road, and now drawing near to Damascus, all on a sudden, about mid-day, a most amazing gleam of light, far exceeding the brightness of the sun, was darted from heaven upon him, and those that were with him, and threw them all for fear prostrate upon the ground. This light was accompanied with a voice in the Hebrew, or rather Syriac, tongue, demanding of him, why it was that he persecuted him so violently? And as Saul was uncertain from whence the words came, 'I am Jesus of Nazareth,' continued the voice, 'whom thou persecutest; but it is 'in vain for thee to resist the decrees of Providence; and therefore be no longer refractory, but obey the commands that shall be given thee.' Whereupon Saul, in a terrible dread and agony, desiring to know what he was to do; 'Go to Damascus,' replied the voice, 'and there thou shalt know my will.' Those that accompanied Saul in his journey were struck with fear and amazement, wondering that they should hear a voice, ^f and yet see no man speak, whilst Saul himself was so dazzled and overpowered by the light, that he quite lost his eye-sight, and was led by the hand into Damascus, where he continued for the space of three days, without taking any manner of sustenance.

At this time there was in the city a certain disciple named Ananias, ^g whom the Lord in a vision commanded by Jerome as a fair village; but it is at present an inconsiderable place, being provided with two small gates, and having in the centre a mosque with a beautiful minaret. It also abounds with fragments of columns, capitals, cornices, &c. in marble. Here the ark of Jehovah triumphed over the Philistine idol Dagon (1 Sam. v. 2.) and here Philip the evangelist was found after he had baptised the Ethiopian eunuch.—Mansford's Gazetteer.—Ed.

^d From hence it appears, that however the Jews were cramped in several privileges originally belonging to their nation, yet, even after they became a Roman province, their great council at Jerusalem had a jurisdiction, which extended to all synagogues, even those that were out of Judea; and that the power of capital punishments was not so far taken from them, but that, either by their own authority, or at least the consent of the Roman governors, they might, in some cases, inflict them.—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^e For an account of Damascus see note b, p. 628. The inquiring reader may also consult Calmet's Dictionary, abridged, Scripture Gazetteer, Edin. 1836—7, and Mansford.—Ed.

^f In Acts xxii. 9. it is said expressly, that the men who were with Saul 'heard not the voice of him that spake to him;' but as the words φωνή and ἀκούειν, both employed in these passages, will admit of different significations, they will be easily reconciled, by saying,—That the people that accompanied Saul heard a sound, a noise, a thunder in the air, for to all these the word φωνή is applicable, but did not hear any articulate words, or did not understand, (for in this sense the word ἀκούειν is often taken,) what that noise or sound meant: in the same manner, as when a voice from heaven was addressed to our Lord, the people that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered, and others, that an angel spake to him, and perhaps none of them understood distinctly what it said, John xii. 29.—Hammond's, and Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^g Who this Ananias was, we have no certain information from antiquity. The apostolical constitutions assert, that he was a to go and find out Saul, then lodging at the house of one Judas, a Jew, and by the imposition of his hands to cure him of his blindness. Ananias was startled at the name of the man, and, to excuse himself, alleged his violent persecutions of the church, and with what a wicked intent he was then come to Damascus: but to this the vision replied, that he was appointed by God to be a powerful instrument in the propagation of the gospel, both among the Jews and Gentiles; and how much soever he had persecuted Christianity heretofore, he was now to become a zealous defender of it, and even to die in testimony of its truth.

A. M. 4039. A. D. 35; OR. A. M. 5446. A. D. 35, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Encouraged with this assurance, Ananias repaired to the house where Saul was, with this joyful message,—‘That the Lord Jesus, who had appeared to him in his journey, had sent him, not only to restore his eye-sight, but to bestow upon him likewise the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, such as might qualify him for the ministry to which he was then appointed.’ And no sooner had Ananias ended his speech, than thick films, like scales, fell from the other’s eyes, whereupon he recovered his eye-sight, and, being baptized, for some days continued with the disciples at Damascus, preaching in the synagogues, and proving that Jesus was the Messiah.

After some stay at Damascus, he retired ¹ into the neighbouring parts of Arabia Deserta, ^a where he first planted the gospel; and, in the beginning of the next year, returned to Damascus again, and there preached Christ publicly in the synagogues; so that all the Jews in that city were not a little amazed and confounded, both at the strange change in his opinions and proceedings, and the powerful efficacy of his arguings and discourses. Their malice however being incensed at having lost so considerable a champion, pursued him close. They contrived all possible means to dispatch him; and after many attempts to no purpose, ² made their request at last to the governor under Aretas, ^b king of Arabia, that he would gratify them in his destruction. Saul, however, had early notice of this, and, knowing that the gates were day and night strictly guarded to prevent his escape, layman; St Austin will have it that he was a priest; but Œcumenius, and some moderns, are of opinion that he was a deacon. The Greeks maintain, that he was one of the seventy disciples, was made bishop of Damascus, and having obtained a crown of martyrdom, was buried in the same city. However this be, it is certain, that in the place where he is said to have been interred, there is a very fine church, which though the Turks have turned into a mosque, yet they still preserve a great respect for his monument.—Catmel’s Commentary, and Dictionary.

¹ Gal. i. 17.

² 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33.

^a The reader need not be told, that Arabia, which is one of the most considerable divisions of Asia, is distinguished into three parts, Deserta, Petraea, and Arabia Felix; or that the Deserta borders upon Syria, and is not far distant from Damascus. What we had rather observe to him is, that, as we learn this passage of the apostle’s life from his own account only, (Gal. i. 17. St Luke, who makes no mention of it in his history, in all probability did not accompany him in this journey; and this makes it the rather believed that the intent of his going into Arabia was not to propagate the gospel, but to find out a retreat, where, by meditation and prayer, he might fit and prepare himself for his future ministry; though it is hardly conceivable, how a person of St Paul’s zeal and activity could suffer himself to lie still amidst so many poor creatures that stood in need of his instructions and therefore others have supposed that the chief intent of his taking this journey was, to carry the glad tidings of the gospel into a country that had never heard of it before.—Catmel’s Commentary.

^b This Aretas, whose name is said to have been Zelus before from one of the houses that stood upon the city-wall he was let ^e down by the disciples in a basket, and so made the best of his way to Jerusalem.

Three years were now past and gone since the time of his conversion; but, notwithstanding this, when he came to Jerusalem, he found but a cold reception among many of the disciples, who were sensible of his former conduct, and, as yet, diffident of the reality of his change; until Barnabas ^d who was privy to all his circumstances, having introduced him to the apostle Peter and James, vouched for his sincerity, and, by declaring the miraculous manner of his conversion, and his zealous preaching at Damascus, dissipated all their doubts, and gained him the right-hand of fellowship, or an intimate communion with the apostles. Here he continued preaching with all boldness, and his sermons were so powerful, and disputations with the Hellenists so unanswerable, that they too, like the Jews at Damascus, formed designs against his life; which when the brethren understood, they conducted him to Casarea, ^e from whence he set sail to his own he came to the crown of Arabia, was father-in-law to Herod Antipas, who some time after divorced his daughter, and made Herodias, his brother Philip’s wife, the consort of his bed. But how this Aretas, who, in the beginning of his reign, by the insinuations of one Syllens, fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, came to be possessed of the sovereignty of Damascus, the capital of Syria, which had been a long while a Roman province, we can no where learn.—Joseph Antiq. b. 16. c. xvi.

^c This was so far from betraying any want of courage in the apostle, that it was only putting in practice his Master’s direction, ‘when they persecute you in one city, flee to another,’ (Mat. x. 23.).

^d Barnabas is supposed to have been an old acquaintance of St Paul’s and a fellow-student under Gamaliel; and, having been lately at Antioch, it is not unlikely that he might there receive the account of his conversion, and consequent behaviour, which made him the readier to become, upon this occasion, his guarantee with the apostles.—Catmel’s Commentary.

^e Some commentators are of opinion, that the place to which the brethren conducted St Paul, was Casarea Philippi, in the extreme northern parts of Palestine, from whence his way lay directly through Syria to Tarsus in Cilicia; but others, with more justness, have observed, that wherever mention is made in the New Testament of Casarea alone, and without any addition, it is always to be understood of the Casarea which Herod the Great built, and whereof Josephus gives us the following account: ‘There was a certain place by the sea-side, formerly called Straton’s Tower, which Herod looked upon as a very commodious tract of ground whereon to raise a city. Accordingly he drew his model, and set people to work, and in twelve years’ time finished it. The buildings were all of marble, private houses as well as palaces; but his master-piece was the port, which he made as large as the Pyreum, or port belonging to Athens, and a safe station against all winds and weathers. The city stands between Dora and Joppa, two wretched sea towns, where there is no riding in the harbour with a south-west wind, which bears so furious upon the shore, that merchantmen are forced to keep off at sea many times, for fear of being driven a-ground. To encounter this difficulty of the place, Herod ordered a mole to be made, in the form of a half-moon, and large enough for a royal navy to ride in; which he did, by letting down stones of a prodigious size, fifty feet in length, eighteen over, and nine deep, and some larger, in twenty fathom water. This mole was two hundred feet in extent, whereof the one half served to break the setting in of the sea, and the other half for the foundation of a stone wall that was fortified with turrets; and underneath this was a quay, or landing place, with a large walk upon it round the port, as a place of pleasure to take the air in. The houses about the port were all uniformly built, of the most excellent sort of marble, and, in the middle of them, on a mount stood a temple, which served as a sea-mark to the mariners, and was celebrated no less for its materials than its workmanship. In this temple there were two statues or images; one of Rome, and the other city, Tarsus, ^a and saw not Jerusalem till several years after.

A. M. 4041. A. D. 37; OR, A. M. 5438. A. D. 37, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END

The church at this time had peace, and flourished exceedingly. Saul diligently preached the word in Cilicia, ^b and Syria; ^c and Peter made a general visitation of all the saints in Judea, Galilee and Samaria. In his progress he arrived at a town called Lydda, ^d where he cured of Cæsar, from whom the city took its name; and, in this city, the contrivance of the very vaults and common sewers, laid at equal distances, and discharging themselves into the sea, was very wonderful. Besides these, Josephus makes mention of a stone theatre, a spacious amphitheatre, and several other buildings; which made him, in another work of his, call it one of the fairest cities in all Judea.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xv. c. 13. on the Jew. War, b. iii. c. 14. and Wells's Geography of the New Testament. Mr Buckingham found this place a scene of desolate ruins: the whole of the surrounding country is also, according to the same traveller, a sandy desert towards the land. The waves wash the ruins of the mole, the towers, and port, towards the sea; and not a creature, except jackalls and beasts of prey, resides within many miles of this silent desolation.—Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer.—Ed.

^a This city is the same with what, in Hebrew, is called Tarshish; and as it stands in a plain, on the banks of the river Cydnus, it was all along, in ancient times, accounted so great a trading town, that all merchant-ships are in holy writ frequently called by the name of ships of Tarshish. In the times of the Romans it was a city of great note, as being not only the metropolis of the province of Cilicia, but honoured likewise with the privileges of a Roman colony, which we find St Paul pleading in his own behalf, (Acts xxii. 25, 28.) and with an academy, furnished with such eminent men, that Serabo scruples not to say, they excelled all others in polite learning and philosophy, even those of Alexandria and Athens; and that Rome itself was beholden to this nursery of all sciences for its best professors; and therefore no wonder that St Paul, who had the first foundation of his erudition laid here, became so well instructed in the liberal arts, and so well acquainted with heathen authors.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^b Cilicia, a country of Asia Minor on the sea-coast, south of Cappadocia and Lycaonia, and bounded by Syria on the east and Pamphylia on the west. Bochart derives its name from the Phœnician word chalekim, which signifies a stone, a designation which is well-suited to part of it to this day, which the Turks call Tis-Hileith, or the Stony Province. Cilicia Proper is described as an extensive plain, well cultivated, and producing great quantities of timber. Tarsus, the birth-place of St Paul, was its capital, and near it is the tomb of Julian the Apostate. The Cilicians enriched themselves by piratical excursions before they were conquered by Pompey, and are represented as having been cruel, dishonest, and barbarous in their manners. Cicero presided over the country as consul, and it was reduced to a province by Vespasian. Josephus says that this country was first peopled by Tarshish, the son of Javan, after whom the whole country was called Tarsis. Cilicia is repeatedly mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and it is probable that St Paul himself introduced the gospel into his native country. We find the Cilicians, among others, disputing with St Stephen, (Acts vi. 9.); and we find St Paul, in company with Silas, proceeding 'through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches,' (Acts xv. 41.) Christianity continued to flourish in this country until the eighth century, when it fell into the hands of the Saracens, by whom, and especially by the Turks, it was almost extinguished. It is at present a province of the Turkish empire.—Scripture Gazetteer, Edin. 1837.—Ed.

^c Though Syria, by heathen authors, is generally used in a large acceptance, and so comprehends both Phœnicia and the Holy Land; yet, as it commonly occurs in the New Testament in a stricter sense, it is bounded on the east by the Euphrates, on the west by Phœnicia and the Mediterranean sea, on the north by Cilicia, and on the south by Judea and Arabia Deserta.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Cabnet's Dictionary.

^d Josephus tells us, that this was a village, not yielding to a city for greatness; (Antiq. b. 20.) and he elsewhere expressly styles it a city. (Jew. War, b. ii.) It was burnt by Cestius, whilst the men were gone from it to Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of tabernacles; but, after the destruction of Jerusalem, it was rebuilt, and made one of the Jewish academies. By the Gentiles one Æneas of a paralytic disorder, which had confined him to his bed for eight years, and thereby prevailed with the inhabitants of Lydda, and of Saron, ^e a neighbouring town, to embrace the Christian profession. From Lydda he was intreated by two messengers to come over to Joppa, a noted port about six miles distance, upon the account of one Tabitha, ^f in Greek called Dorcas, a Christian woman, venerable for her piety, and diffusive charity, who was lately dead. When he came to the house, he found the body in an upper chamber, ready washed, and prepared for its funeral, and attended with many sorrowful widows, who durst not request of him to raise her from the dead, but by their tears and lamentations, and large commendations of her charity, sufficiently testified their desire; so that the apostle, having caused the company to withdraw, first kneeled down, and made his supplications to God: and then turning to the body, with one word speaking, raised her up, and presented her alive to her friends and relations, which gained him a great number of converts at Joppa, and encouraged him, for some considerable time, to take up his abode there, lodging in the house of one Simon a tanner.

While he abode at Joppa, retiring one day ^g to the top of the house about noon-tide to pray, after he had ended his devotions, he found himself hungry; but while the people were preparing his dinner, he fell into a trance, wherein was presented to him a large sheet, or table-cloth, let down, as it were, by the four corners from heaven, wherein were creatures of all kinds, clean and unclean; and at the same time he heard a voice, calling him to kill and eat freely of them, which when Peter, a little too tenacious of the rites and institutions of the Mosaic law, declared his aversion to do, the voice rejoined, that what God had pronounced clean, he ought it was called Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter; but, by the Christians, in the times of the holy wars, it had the name of St George's, partly from a magnificent temple, which the emperor Justinian there erected in honour of that saint, and partly from an erroneous opinion then prevailing among them, that in that place he obtained the crown of martyrdom.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament. Volney, describing this town, says, that a place lately ravaged by fire and sword would have precisely the same appearance; and that, from the huts of the inhabitants, to the palace of the Aga, is one vast heap of rubbish and ruins. There is, however, a kind of weekly market held here; and the Christian residents show the ruins of the church of St Peter, and many spots where tradition says that apostle preached, prayed, &c.—Ed.

^e Is a town adjoining to Joppa, giving name to the spacious and fruitful vale which reaches from Cesarea to Joppa, and among the Rabbins is famous for its vines.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^f The true reason why St Luke gives this interpretation of her Syrian name, seems to be this,—that as she was a Jewess, who spake nothing but Greek, she was called by her first name among the Jews, and by her second among the Greeks; for in both languages the two names signify the same thing, namely, a goat or a roe.—Whitby's Annotations.

^g At the dedication of the temple, Solomon had so oft and so solemnly requested of God that he would hearken to the supplications of his people, who should at any time spread out their hands towards that place, (2 Kings viii. 30, 38.) that it thence became a custom among the Jews, whenever they were absent from Jerusalem, to offer up their prayers in places where they might have a free prospect towards it. Thus of Daniel it is recorded, that when he prayed, as he did it three times a day, the windows of his chamber were opened towards Jerusalem, (Dan. vi. 10.) and therefore, in all likelihood, St Peter being now at Joppa, went up to the roof of the house, to pray, for the same reason.—Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4041. A. D. 37; OR, A. M. 5448. A. D. 37, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

by no means to account common or unclean. ^a This representation was made to him three several times, after which the sheet was again taken up, and the vision disappeared. But while Peter was revolving with himself what the meaning of this might be, three messengers knocked at the door, desiring to speak with him; and when they had delivered their message, namely, that Cornelius, a Roman, captain of a company in the Italian legion, ^b then at Cæsarea, and a person of eminent virtue, piety, and charity, had, by an immediate command from God, sent to him; he the next day, with six other brethren from Joppa, went along with them, and the day following arrived at Cæsarea.

Cornelius, in expectation of his coming, had invited his friends and relations to his house, and as Peter drew near, fell down at his feet to worship him; but the apostle rejecting the honour, as what was due to God alone, entered into the house, and there made his apology to the company, namely, 'that though they could not but know, that it was not lawful for a Jew to converse, in the duties of religion especially, with those of another nation: yet, since God had now taught him to make no distinction, he very readily attended their pleasure, desiring to know the occasion of their sending for him.' Whereupon Cornelius made answer, 'that he did it upon the express command of God, who, by his angel, ^c had ^a The great distinction thrown by God around his people, to preserve them separate from the Gentiles, was the diet peculiar to themselves; which was an effectual bar to familiar intercourse and to idolatrous customs, as he declares, (Lev. xx. 23—25.) Thus Eleazer in Aristæus, apud Joseph. p. 17. and Eusebius, Præp. Evang. i. 8. c. 9. p. 371. Hence the Jews esteemed the Gentiles who ate these meats as unclean; and held, that the unclean beasts signified the nations of the world. The vision included all manner of beasts, &c., and creeping things, because they are included in the text of Lev. xx. 25. This explains Acts ix. 3. and the meaning of St Peter's saying, ver. 28. that God had showed him that he should 'call no man common or unclean;' because by the vision he took off the restriction which hindered any converse with other nations. And it was highly expedient that this liberty should be expressly revealed from heaven, or the apostles could not, as Jews, teach all nations, 'putting no difference between them,' (chap. xi. 12. and xv. 9.) or have any intercourse, which violated a former law given by God himself.—Whitby. The vision, besides its figurative meaning, had a literal one, and signified that the distinction of meats as well as of men, was now to be abolished.—Bishop Warburton.—Ed.

^b The cohorts of the Romans, which the Greek renders στρατιάς, and we, band, was a body of infantry, consisting of five hundred men, ten of which bands made a legion. And the manner in which the Romans distinguished and denominated their bands and legions was very various. Sometimes it was from the order of places; and so they were called the first or second band, according to their rank and precedence; sometimes from the commanders they were under; as, the Augustan and Claudian band, &c., because persons of that name did lead them; sometimes from their own behaviour; as, the Victrix, the Ferrea, the Conquering, the Iron band, &c., by reason of the great valour, which, in some sharp engagements, these had shown; sometimes from the countries they were chiefly quartered in: as the German and Pannonian band, &c., and sometimes from the parts from whence they were gathered, as this of Cornelius is called the Italian band, because it was raised out of that country, and was a body of forces well known, for their gallantry and great exploits, among the writers of the Roman history.—Cobinet's Commentary.

^c But if God was so very kind to Cornelius, as to send an angel to him, why did he not at the same time give that angel commission to instruct him in what he was to do, and to save his apostle a journey from Joppa to Cæsarea? Now, besides the honour which God, in this method of proceeding, designed to confer upon St Peter and his ministry, it is apparent, that hereby ordered him to send for him at Joppa, from whom he should receive some special instruction; and that for this reason they were all then met together, attending the commands which he had brought them from God.

Hereupon St Peter began his discourse, and declared, 'that now he perceived plainly, that God had made no distinction of persons and people, but that the pious and godly of all nations were to meet with acceptance; that peace and reconciliation between God and man was a doctrine published by the prophets of old, and of late since the time of John the Baptist, preached through Galilee and Judea; that of this peace Jesus of Nazareth was the only mediator between God and man, as appeared by the divine powers and graces wherewith he was invested, and which he constantly exercised in doing good to mankind; that of his life and actions, more especially of his crucifixion by the Jews, and resurrection from the dead, of his appearing to his disciples, and even eating and drinking with them after his resurrection, he and the rest of the apostles were chosen witnesses; and that from him they had received, before his ascension, a command and commission, to publish to all nations under heaven, that he was the person whom God had appointed to be the great judge of all the world.'

While Peter was thus preaching to them, the Holy Ghost fell upon all that heard him, without the imposition of the apostle's hands. This made the Jewish converts who came along with Peter, wonder not a little, that the gifts of the Holy Ghost should be poured upon the Gentiles; but Peter perceiving it, ordered them ^d immediately to be baptized. This was a great sign, that God intended to let us know, that we are not to expect extraordinary ways of instruction, where he hath instituted ordinary means. The angel, no doubt, might as readily have told Cornelius what he ought to do, as bid him send for Peter, and God could as easily have given him his Spirit at that time, as four days after; but then this would not have been so agreeable to the order which Christ had settled in his church. Christ had appointed his apostles to minister his ordinances; and therefore God did not suffer even an angel to break in upon this economy, but ordered St Peter to wait upon the centurion, that his divine mercy might not redound upon him only, but be extended to his relations and friends.—Whitby's Annotations.

^d But whom did he order to do this? the Gentiles. It seems at first sight not a little absurd, that they who were not yet baptized themselves, should baptize others. Or were they some of those who came along with him to Cæsarea? These are generally supposed to be no more than lay-brethren, who were not permitted to baptize, but in cases of necessity. But, considering that St Peter was now upon his visitation through Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, it seems reasonable that he should carry some of his deacons, at least, along with him, to attend in such offices as these. Such was the beginning of the conversion of the Gentiles: for that Cornelius and his company were the first fruits of the heathen world, is evident from the injunction which our Saviour gave his apostles, 'not to go into the way of the Gentiles,' (Mat. x. 5.) from the practice of those that were scattered abroad upon the death of Stephen, but preached the word to the Jews only, (Acts xi. 19.) from the wonder which the Jewish converts with St Peter expressed, when they saw, 'that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gifts of the Holy Ghost,' (Acts x. 45.) and from the alteration which the brethren at Jerusalem had with him at his return. 'Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them,' (Acts xi. 3.) which to some is a proof sufficient that the door of faith was not opened to the Gentiles before the conversion of Cornelius; who, according to the account of some Latin writers, was made afterwards bishop of Cæsarea of Palestine, where he suffered martyrdom. But since Eusebius, who was bishop of that church, does not reckon him among the number of his predecessors, we have reason to suspect the truth of this piece of history.—Whitby's Annotations, and Cobinet's Commentary.

A. M. 4047. A. D. 43; OR, A. M. 5454. A. D. 43, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

diately to be baptized, and, to instruct them more fully in their Christian profession, tarried for some considerable time with them.

When he returned to Jerusalem, the Jewish converts, ^a who still retained their inveterate prejudice against the Gentiles, utterly condemned him for conversing so familiarly, and eating with them; but, for his apology, having given them a plain narrative of the whole affair, and the occasion of it, he concluded at last with this inference, 'that since God had been pleased to bestow upon these Gentiles the same privileges and marks of conversion that he had done on his select disciples, it would in him have been direct disobedience to the divine will, had he denied them admission into the church, or refused them his instructions and conversation;' which fully satisfied the audience, and turned their displeasure against him into praise and thanksgiving to God, for having communicated the same mercy to the Gentiles that he had done to the Jews.

After the general dispersion which followed upon St Stephen's death, some disciples who were born in Cyprus, and Cyrene, ^b having travelled through several countries, and hitherto preached to the Jews only, when they came to Antioch, ^c and there heard of the conver-

^a The ancient fathers are generally of opinion, that the apostles themselves had no hand in this controversy; and some of them suppose, that the great fomentor of it was Cerinthus, whose heresy grew afterwards famous in the church. But if we consider how zealous the Jews, even after their conversion, were for their laws and customs, (Acts xxi, 20, 21.) how St Peter himself, before he received this vision, laid it down for a rule, that it was unlawful for a Jew to converse with an alien, (Acts x, 28.) and, even after this vision, how he withdrew from the believing Gentiles, for fear of the censure of those who came from Jerusalem, (Gal. ii, 12.) we cannot see why it should be inconsistent with the character of the very greatest of the apostles, to inquire into the reason of St Peter's conduct, which according to their present persuasion, was not warrantable; since 'this was a mystery,' as St Paul tells us, 'which in other ages was not known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, namely, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of God's promises in Christ, by the gospel,' (Eph. iii, 5, 6.)—Calmet's Commentary, and Hilthy's Annotations.

^b This was a city of great note, and once of such power, as to contend with Carthage for some pre-eminencies. It stood upon the western parts of Lybia, properly so called; and, as it was the principal city, it sometimes gave the name of Cyrenaica to the whole country, which by the sacred writer is parapsitically called 'Lybia about Cyrene,' (Acts ii, 10.) The city itself is famous in profane writers, for being the birth place of Eratosthenes the mathematician, of Callimachus the poet, and, in holy writ, of Simon, whom the Jews compelled to bear our Saviour's cross.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.—See a further account of this city in the Scripture Gazetteer, Edin. 1837.

^c This Antioch, to distinguish it from sixteen other cities, which, in Syria, and other countries, bore that name, was frequently called Antiochia Epidaphne, from its neighbourhood to Daphne, a village where the temple of Daphne stood. It was built, as some say, by Antiochus Epiphanes; as others, by Seleucus Nicator, the first king of Syria after Alexander the Great, in memory of his father Antiochus; and was, after that, the royal seat of the kings of Syria. In the flourishing times of the Roman empire it was the ordinary residence of the prefect, or governor of the eastern provinces, and was also honoured with the residence of many of the Roman emperors, especially of Verus and Valens, who spent here the greatest part of their time. As to its situation, it lay on both sides of the river Orontes, about twelve miles distant from the Mediterranean sea; was in former times adorned with many sumptuous palaces, and stately temples, and, both by nature and art, fortified even to admiration; but, being taken by the Saracens, and afterwards by the Turks, it began to grow into decay, and is now in so desolate and ruinous a condition, that the patriarch has long since removed his dwelling to Damascus.—Hilthy's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament. We have the testimony of Chrysostom, both of the vast increase of this illustrious church in the fourth century, and of the spirit of charity which continued to actuate it. It consisted at this time of not less than a hundred thousand persons, three thousand of whom were supported out of the public donations. It is painful to trace the progress of declension in such a church as this. But the period now referred to, namely, the age of Chrysostom, towards the close of the fourth century, may be considered as the brightest of its history subsequent to the apostolic age, and that from which the church at Antioch may date its fall. It continued indeed outwardly prosperous; but superstition, secular ambition, the pride of life, pomp and formality in the service of God, in place of humility and sincere devotion, the growth of faction, and the decay of charity, showed that real religion was fast disappearing, and that the foundations were laid of that great apostasy, which, in two centuries from this time, overspread the whole Christian world; led to the entire extinction of the church in the East; and still holds dominion over the fairest portions of the west. Antioch, under its modern name of Antakia, is now but little known to the western nations. It occupies, or rather did till lately occupy a remote corner of the ancient enclosure of its walls. Its splendid buildings were reduced to hovels; and its population of half a million, to 10,000 wretched beings, living in the usual debasement and insecurity of Turkish subjects. Such was nearly its condition when visited by Pocock about the year 1738, and again by Kinneir in 1813. But its ancient subterranean enemy, which since the destruction of 587 has never long together withheld its assaults, has again triumphed over it: the convulsion of the 13th of August, 1822, laid it once more in ruins; and every thing relating to Antioch is past.—Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer.—Ed.

^d The learned Grotius is pretty positive, that instead of πρός τοὺς Ἕλληνοστᾶς, as it is in our vulgar copies, and denotes such Jews as spake the Greek language, we should read, πρός τοὺς Ἕλληνας, that is, Greeks who were Gentiles: for which he produces not only the Syriac, Arabic, and Latin versions, but the Alexandrian manuscript likewise, as indeed the whole series and purport of St Luke's discourse seems to require it. For, having given us an account of what happened to Cornelius at Caesarea, he next proceeds to another piece of history of the like nature, namely, the conversion of several other Gentiles in the city of Antioch, which, when it came to be known at Jerusalem, confirmed the brethren in the belief of God's design to receive the Gentiles into the bosom of his church, and gave a great weight to what St Peter had testified concerning this matter.—Hilthy's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.—Bloomfield, in his Greek Testament, contends strenuously in favour of the received reading, Γραικοίς, 'Ἕλληνοστᾶς'; and shows by various arguments that the reading 'Ἕλληνας', Greeks, approved of in this note, has no support from either external or internal evidence. Boothroyd translates 'Hellenists,' by which he means Greek proselytes to Judaism; but the Hellenists were Jews who lived in Grecian countries and spoke the Greek language.—Ed.

^e The Scripture acquaints us, (Acts iv, 36.) that his name was originally Joses; that he was descended of the tribe of Levi, but born at Cyprus; and that, as he was the first who sold an estate, and put the purchase money into the common fund then applied to the sustenance of poor Christians, he very likely from that action received the name of Barnabas, which, according to St Luke's interpretation, signifies the son of consolation. But, besides the qualifications mentioned in the text, there were two other reasons that might induce the apostles to make choice of Barnabas, preferably to any other, upon this occasion: 1st. Because he was a great master of the Greek, which was the current language of Antioch, as being himself born at Cyprus, where that language only was in use; and, 2dly. Because the apostles thought it might be more agreeable to these first planters of the gospel in Antioch, who were a great many of them natives of Cyprus, to have a fellow-labourer of the same country sent amongst them.—Calmet's Commentary.

A. M. 1047. A. D. 43; OR, A. M. 5154. A. D. 43, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

pious man, and endued with many excellent gifts, to assist the disciples, and confirm the believers in that city. The success of the gospel in so large a place was no small consolation to him: and therefore, having exhorted the brethren to hold fast the profession of their faith, he thence departed to Tarsus, to find out Saul, and with him in a short time returned to Antioch; where, for the space of a whole year, they daily resorted to the places of public concourse, and gained converts so numerous and considerable, that in this city the disciples of Jesus Christ first obtained the honourable name of Christians.^a

This opened an intercourse between Jerusalem and Antioch; so that, when certain persons, who at that time had the spirit of prophecy, were come from Jerusalem, and among them one named Agabus, ^b had foretold, that there would shortly be a great famine in many parts of the Roman empire, which accordingly happened in the fourth year of the reign of Claudius, the Christians of Antioch determined to make a collection for their brethren in Judea, ^c which, upon the approach of the dearth, they accordingly did, and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul. But, before their arrival at Jerusalem, Agrippa, the grandson of Herod the Great, merely to ingratiate himself with the Jews, raised a sharp persecution against the Christians. He ordered James, the son of Zebedee, and brother of John,

^a Before this they were called amongst themselves, 'brethren, saints, disciples, believers, the faithful,' and 'those that called on the name of Christ,' and among their enemies, 'Galileans, Nazarenes,' and 'the men of the sect;' but now, by the conversion of so many heathens both in Casarea and Antioch, the believing Jews and Gentiles being all made one church, this new name was given them, as more expressive of their common relation to their master Christ. And that it was given them in a solemn manner, we have reason to conclude from the propriety of the original word; for χριστιανισμοί is commonly used with regard to edicts and proclamations, such especially as contain the people's professions of allegiance to emperors, and the privileges granted by them to the people; and therefore it seems not improbable, that the imposition of this name was done by a public act and declaration of the whole church, about the beginning of the reign of Claudius, ten years after our Lord's ascension, as an ancient historian informs us, whether Euodius was at that time the bishop of Antioch or not.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, and Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

^b Who this Agabus was, we have no account in any ecclesiastical history; only the Greeks tell us, that he was one of our Lord's seventy disciples, and as he is said to have suffered martyrdom at Antioch, accordingly they observe his festival on the eighth of March. But, in regard to the truth of this prophecy, Eusebius tells us, that the famine which he foretold, oppressed almost the whole empire, and was recorded by historians the most averse to the Christian religion, namely, by Dion Cassius, who calls it 'a very great famine,' (Hist. h. xvi.) by Josephus, who tells us 'that in Judea many perished for want of victuals,' (Antiq. h. xx. c. 2.) and by Suetonius, who observes, that the emperor himself, upon this occasion, was so insulted by the people in the common market-place, that he was obliged, by a postern gate, to retire into his palace: in Claudio, c. xviii.—Catmel's Commentary, and Whittly's Annotations.—History records no fewer than four famines which happened in the reign of Claudius, but it is generally agreed that the famine here referred to was that which took place in the fourth year of his reign.—Ed.

^c The reasons why this supply was principally sent to Judea, might be, either because there the calamity fell heaviest, or because believers were like to find least pity there, or because this was a fitting testimony of gratitude to the country, from whence the means of their conversion first came, according to that subsequent reasoning of St Paul's, 'if we have sown unto you spiritual things, ought it to be accounted a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?' (1 Cor. ix. 11.)—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.

commonly called the Great, ^d to be beheaded; and, having apprehended Peter, and put him in prison, he set a guard of sixteen soldiers upon him, designing, immediately after the feast of the passover, to bring him forth to the Jews, and, if they desired it, to have him executed. But the very night before the day intended for his arraignment and execution, God sent an angel from heaven, who knocked off his chains, ^e opened the prison-door, and, without the guards once perceiving it, carried him quite out; whereupon he went directly to the house of Mary, ^f the mother of John, surnamed Mark, where several disciples were met together, and sending up their prayers to heaven for his deliverance. As he stood knocking without, a maid of the house, named Rhoda, perceiving that it was his voice, ran in, and acquainted the company, that Peter was at the door; but, when she persisted in the thing, they concluded rather, that it must have been his angel, ^g until, being let in, he related to them the whole manner of his miraculous escape: and, having ordered them to acquaint James, and the other

^d This was James the greater, son of Zebedee, and must be distinguished from James the less, son of Alphaeus. This latter was put to death by Ananias the high-priest, during the reign of Nero. This James with his brother John were those who requested to sit on the right and left hand of our Lord, (Mat. xx. 23.) and our Lord's prediction was now fulfilled in one of them, who by his martyrdom drank of our Lord's cup, and was baptized with his baptism. By the death of James, the number of the apostles was reduced to eleven; and we do not find that ever it was filled up. The apostles never had any successors; God has continued their doctrine, but not their order. By killing with the sword, we are to understand beheading. Among the Jews there were four kinds of deaths: 1. Stoning; 2. burning; 3. killing with the sword, or beheading; and 4. strangling. The third was a Roman as well as a Jewish mode of punishment. Killing with the sword was the punishment which, according to the Talmud, was inflicted on those who drew away the people to any strange worship. James was probably accused of this; and hence the punishment mentioned in the text.—Dr. A. Clarke.—Ed.

^e In chap. xii. 6. we are told that Peter was placed between two soldiers, and bound with two chains. The way in which prisoners were chained among the Romans, was as follows: an iron chain of convenient length was fastened at one end to the hand of the prisoner, and at the other to the arm of the soldier. When a person was committed to the care of one soldier, which was commonly done, there was consequently but one chain, and this was fastened to the right hand of the prisoner, and to the left arm of the soldier, as we learn from Seneca. It is very easy to conclude, that when a second soldier, and a second chain were appointed, the prisoner must wear the second chain on his left hand and the soldier on his right.—Lardner's Credibility, b. i. c. 19.—Ed.

^f This house stood upon mount Zion; and according to Epiphanius, having escaped the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, it was afterwards turned into a famous church, called the church of Zion, which endured for several ages.—Catmel's Commentary and Dictionary.

^g That the word ἄγγελος, or 'angel,' signifies not only a celestial spirit, but also a messenger sent from one to another, we allow is manifest from several passages in scripture; but that it cannot, in this place, denote a common messenger, is evident for this reason, namely, that the damsel could know St Peter no otherwise than either by his voice or face, which the company might believe his angel was capable of imitating; whereas St Peter could not but know, that no messenger from the prison, had he been allowed to send one, was able to do this; and therefore, since it was a vulgar opinion among the Jews, that good men had their tutelar angels, or at least that angels were sent down from heaven about their affairs, they, by this angel, might understand, either erroneously a guardian angel attending on him, or, agreeably to scripture, an angel sent down from heaven to acquaint them with something relating to him in answer to their prayers.—Hammoul's and Whittly's Annotations.

A. M. 4047. A. D. 43; OR, A. M. 5454. A. D. 43, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

brethren, with this good news, he withdrew himself to a place of more retirement and security.

In the morning, as soon as it was day, the soldiers missing their prisoner, were in the utmost confusion; and Agrippa, finding himself disappointed in his wicked design, commanded the keepers to be put to death, as supposing them accessory to St Peter's escape, and so departed from Jerusalem to Casarea. ^a While he was here, the ambassadors of Tyre and Sidon, relying on the interest they had with Blastus, the lord high chamberlain, came to solicit an accommodation of some difference that had lately happened between their states and the king, and that the rather, because in this time of scarcity, their ^b country was in a great measure dependent on the king's dominions for its support. Agrippa, though highly displeas'd with them, appointed them a day of audience; and being dress'd in his royal robes, and seated on his throne, made such an oration, as the flattering multitude call'd 'the speech of a god, and not of a man;' which he, with a secret pride and vanity, assuming to himself, was that moment struck by an angel with a mortification in his bowels, ^c of which, in a short time, he died.

About the time of the death of Agrippa, Saul and Barnabas, having disposed of their contributions to the

^a Josephus, who gives us an account both of this journey and the occasion of it, informs us, that he went down to the city of Casarea to perform the solemnities, and the games, which were there celebrated every Olympiad, to the honour of Cæsar, and that the nobles and governors of Syria repaired to that city for the same purpose.—Antiq. b. xix. c. 7.

^b The inhabitants of the countries of Tyre and Sidon, which were very narrow, and pent up by the sea, took little pains in the cultivation of their ground. Their whole business and employment was commerce; and therefore they were beholden to Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, which were all at this time under Agrippa's jurisdiction, for most of the common necessaries of life, as appears from 1 Kings v. 9, 11, and Ezek. xxvii. 17.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c In testimony of the truth of this piece of sacred history, Josephus relates the manner of this king's death, and what was esteem'd the occasion of it, in the following terms:—'Upon the second day of the festival, Agrippa went early in the morning to the theatre, in a silver studd, so wonderfully rich and curious, that the beams of the rising sun striking upon it, people's eyes were dazzled with the reflection, and, as the sparkling of the light seem'd to have something divine in it, it mov'd the spectators, at the same time, both with veneration and dread. Hereupon a crew of fawning parasites cried him up for a god, and beseech'd him in form to forgive them the sins of their ignorance, when they took him only for flesh and blood, like another man; but they were now convinc'd, they said, of an excellency in his nature more than human. This impious flattery pass'd upon him without either check or repulse; but while he was in the vanity of this contemplation, hitting up his eyes, he saw an owl in the air over his head, sitting upon a rope, which he found, soon after, to be the presage of mischief to him, as it had been before of good luck; for he fell immediately into violent gripes and torments in his bowels, and in this agony, directing his speech to his friends about him, Look ye, says he, your god is now condemn'd to die; and by this fatal necessity, I am about to prove all my flatterers to be a company of profligate liars, and to convince the world, by dying, that I am not immortal;—but God's will be done. With these words his pain increased upon him, so that he was forc'd to remove into his palace; and, as it continu'd without any manner of abatement, at the end of five days it carried him off, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and the seventh of his reign.'—Antiq. b. xix. c. 7.—Josephus indeed does not say, that he was eaten up with worms; but he tells us, that he had terrible pains in his guts, which, in the space of five days, might breed worms in him, as he confesses they did in his grandfather.—Whitby's Annotations.

Christians in Jerusalem and Judea, return'd back to the city of Antioch, and brought with them Mark; ^d but they had not long been there, before God, by some particular inspiration, gave them to understand, that he had appointed them to carry his word into other places: whereupon the church that was at Antioch, betook themselves to fasting and prayer; and Simeon, ^e Lucius, ^f and Manaen, ^g men endued with a spirit of prophecy, laid their hands ^h on them, and so sent them away to preach, wherever the Holy Ghost should require them to go.

When therefore they had departed from Antioch, the first came to Seleucia, ⁱ from whence they took shipping for Cyprus, and in the city of Salamis ^k first began their ^d Calmet is of opinion, that John Mark is a different person from Mark the evangelist; but they are consider'd to have been the same person by Jones, Lightfoot, Wetstein, Lardner, Michaelis, and Taylor. To strengthen this opinion, Mr Taylor remarks that it should be observ'd, that throughout the Acts he is spoken of as 'John whose surname was Mark;' that is, Luke, writing in Italy, latinizes; it being customary for Jews, when in foreign countries, to use names more familiar to those countries, than their Hebrew appellations; and if Mark, as is beyond a doubt, accompany'd Peter to Rome, he would be known there by his surname only.—Calmet's Dictionary abridged.—Ed.

^e This Simeon, who is surnam'd Niger, is suppos'd by some to be the same with Simon the Cyrenean, who bore our Saviour's cross; but for this opinion there is no other proof than the similitude of names; which, in this case, is far from being exact, since St Luke always call Simon the Cyrenean by the name of Simon, but Simon Niger by the name of Simeon.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f This Lucius is said by some to have been one of our Lord's seventy disciples, and by the apostles to have been constituted the first bishop of Cyrene; but of these and some other pretended passages of his life and death, we have no manner of certainty.—Calmet's Commentary.

^g This Manaen must needs have been a person of a considerable family and distinction, because we find that he was brought up with Herod Antipas, the tetrarch, who put John the Baptist to death; and yet we are told, that he was one of the seventy disciples, and suffer'd martyrdom in Antioch; but when, or in what manner, we have no information.—Calmet's Commentary.

^h Some have imagin'd, that this imposition of hands was a solemn ordination of Paul and Barnabas to be bishops in the Christian church; but, besides the incongruity of an apostle's being ordain'd bishop by those of an inferior order, as prophets and teachers were, (Acts xiii. 1.) St Paul declares for himself, that he 'was an apostle, not of men, neither by men, but by Jesus Christ,' (Gal. i. 1.) And as the apostleship comprehends in it all ecclesiastical power, this laying on of hands was not design'd to give them any episcopal authority, as is pretended, but merely to 'recommend them to the grace of God, for the work which they were to fulfil,' (Acts xiv. 26.) as being a ceremony that attend'd prayer and benediction, and other solemn actions, as well as ordination. Thus the children of Israel laid their hands on the Levites when they were separat'd to the service of Aaron and his sons, Numb. vii. 10, and thus our bless'd Saviour, when the children were brought to him, put his hands upon them, and bless'd them, (Mat. xix. 15) so that this imposition of hands upon Paul and Barnabas was precatory, not consecratory; design'd to implore the blessing of heaven upon their mission to the Gentiles, and not to obtain, or confirm them bishops of the church of Christ.—Miscell. Soc. vol. ii.

ⁱ This city lay on the west, or rather a little north-west, of Antioch, upon the Mediterranean sea; and was so nam'd from the founder of it, Seleucus, who was reputed to be the greatest builder in the world; for he is said to have found'd nine cities, call'd by his own name; sixteen in memory of his father Antiochus: six by the name of Laodice, his mother; and three in honour of Apamea, his first wife; besides many others of great note in Greece and Asia, either new built, or beautify'd and repaired by him.—Hill's Geography of the New Testament.

^k This was once a famous city in the isle of Cyprus, opposite to Seleucia, on the Syrian coast; and as it was the first place ministerial office. Here they preached in the synagogues, and employed Mark, who was of their company, in several offices of the church, which they could not attend themselves. From Salamis they crossed the island unto Paphos, ^a where the proconsul, or governor of the place, ^b who at that time was Sergius Paulus, had his residence; a man of great wisdom and prudence, but unhappily seduced by a Jewish sorcerer, named Barjesus. Upon their preaching there, the governor, being informed of something extraordinary, sent to the apostles to hear their doctrine. But the sorcerer warily opposed this, and used all possible methods to hinder his conversion: which, when Saul perceived, he, in the governor's presence, having sharply rebuked him, denounced a judgment of blindness upon him; which being immediately inflicted, convinced the proconsul, and converted him to the faith; and from this event, as some imagine, our apostle had the surname of Paul: ^c given him.

A. M. 4049. A. D. 45; OR, A. M. 5456. A. D. 45, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

From the isle of Cyprus, St Paul and his company sailed to Perga in Pamphylia; ^d where Mark, not greatly where the gospel was preached, it was, in the primitive times, made the see of the primate or metropolitan of the whole island. In the reign of the emperor Trajan it was destroyed by the Jews, and rebuilt; but after that, being, in the year 648, sacked, and razed to the ground, by the Saracens, it never recovered its former splendour, though out of its ruins is said to have arisen Famagusta, which was the chief place of the isle when the Turks took it from the Venetians in the year 1570.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^a This was another city of Cyprus, lying on the western, as Salamis did on the eastern, tract of the island, where Venus, who from hence took the name of Paphia, had her most ancient and celebrated temple, and where the Roman proconsul at this time had his seat of residence.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.—Paphos is at present the seat of a Greek bishop, but is reduced to a very low state of poverty and insignificance.—Mansford.—Ed.

^b At this time the provinces of the Roman empire, according to the division of Augustus, were of two kinds; the one having governors appointed by the emperor, and called pro-prators, the other having governors appointed by the senate, and called pro-consuls, though they had never filled the consular chair. Cyprus, though it had been once pratorian, was now a province of the latter kind.—Holden's Christian Expositor.

^c It is very observable, that all along before this passage of the apostle's life, St Luke calls him by the name of Saul, but ever after by that of Paul; which makes some imagine, that he assumed that name to himself, in memory of his converting Sergius Paulus; just as the ancient Roman generals were wont to adopt the names of the provinces which they conquered. St Austin more than once asserts, that he took it out of a principle of humility, by a small variation changing his former name, whereby a proud, haughty king of Israel was called, into that of Paulus, which signifies little; and that, in conformity to this, he calls himself Ἰακώβος, (Eph. iii. 8.) which is a word made by himself on purpose, 'less than the least of the apostles.' But the most rational account of the matter seems to be that of Origen, viz. that he being of Jewish parentage, and born in Tarsus, a Roman city, had at his circumcision two names given him, Saul, a Jewish, and Paul, a Roman name; and that when he preached to the Jews, he was called by his Jewish, and when to the Gentiles, as he did chiefly after this time, by his Roman name.—Calmel's Commentary, and Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^d Pamphylia is a province of Asia Minor, which gives the name to that part of the Mediterranean-sea which washes its coasts, (Acts xxvii. 5.) To the south it is bounded by the Mediterranean, and to the north by Pisidia; having Lycia to the west, and Cilicia to the east: and as for Perga, a city of this province, it is memorable among the heathens for the temple of Diana, who was thence called Diana Pergæa; and for the solemn festivals which, in honour of her, were there annually observed.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

liking this itinerant course of life, took his leave of the apostles, and returned to Jerusalem. At Perga they made no stay, but proceeded directly to Antioch in Pisidia; ^e where, going into the synagogue, and being courteously invited ^f to make a comment, or discourse, as the custom then was, upon the lessons out of the law and the prophets, that were just before read in the congregation, St Paul took this opportunity, in a long discourse, to show, 'That Jesus was the true Messiah, foretold by the prophets, and declared by John the Baptist; that though he was barbarously treated, and crucified, and slain by the Jews, yet this was no more than what the same prophets had foretold would happen to the Messiah; that God's raising him from the dead, according to the predictions relating to the Messiah, and, after his resurrection, showing him to multitudes of witnesses then alive, and ready to attest the truth of it, were the highest demonstrations of his being the Son of God; and that therefore, since forgiveness of sins and justification, which could not be attained by the law of Moses, was now tendered to them by their believing in Jesus, it nearly concerned them, as a matter of the last importance, not to neglect so great salvation.'

This the congregation heard with great attention; and, as they were going out of the synagogue, the Gentiles desired of St Paul to speak again to them upon the same subject on the following sabbath; and several Jews, and proselytes, who believed, waited upon Paul and Barnabas for further instruction. The next sabbath, the whole city flocked to the synagogue to hear the apostle's discourse; which when the unbelieving Jews saw, such was their envy and despite, that they not only opposed themselves with blasphemy against what St Paul preached, but, perceiving the progress which the gospel made, not in that city only, but in all the neighbouring country, they applied themselves to some female ^g proselytes of distinction, who, by their interest with the principal men of the city, forced the apostles to depart to Iconium; ^h and after some stay there, their malice pursuing them ^e Pisidia is a small province in Asia Minor, bounded on the south by Pamphylia, and on the north by Galatia, having Lycaonia to the east, and Phrygia to the west. Its inhabitants are commended by Livy for their skill in war above other Asiatics, (b. xxxviii. c. 13.) and its chief city was Antioch, built by Seleucus, in honour of his father Antiochus, and, to distinguish it from others of the same name, usually called Antiochia Pisidiæ.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^f What the service of the synagogue was, particularly as to the reading of the law and the prophets, and expounding thereupon, we had occasion to explain before.

^g Women, who being originally Gentiles, had embraced the Jewish religion; and of converts of this kind it is generally observed, that their zeal and superstition is usually blinder, and their attention to reason, in matters of religion, weaker, than what belongs to the other sex; insomuch, that some ecclesiastical writers have made it their remark, that there never was any heresy or schism in the Christian church, but what was either begun or fomented by women of wealth and distinction.—Calmel's Commentary.

^h Iconium was the chief city of Lycaonia, a small province of Asia Minor. The church planted at this place by St Paul continued to flourish, until, by the persecutions of the Saracens, and afterwards of the Seljukian Turks, who made it the capital of one of their sultanies, it was nearly extinguished. But some Christians of the Greek and Armenian churches, with a Greek archbishop, are still found in the suburbs of this city, who are not permitted to reside within the walls. Iconium is now called Cogni, and is still a considerable city: being thither likewise, caused them to hasten to Lystra; where they continued for some time, preaching the gospel to the inhabitants of that city, and to the people of the parts adjacent.

A. M. 4050. A. D. 46; OR, A. M. 5457. A. D. 46 &c. FROM ACTS. i. 10. TO THE END.

At Lystra there was a man named Aneas, lame from his birth, whom St Paul, perceiving by his diligent attention to his preaching, that he had faith to be healed, immediately cured. This so amazed and transported the standers by, that, acknowledging a divine power in the miracle, they took them for two gods, ^a disguised in human shape; calling Paul, ^b as chief speaker, Mercury; and Barnabas, perhaps for his gravity, or majestic looks, Jupiter. The priest of Jupiter therefore, as soon as he was acquainted with the matter, brought oxen, all adorned with garlands, ^c to the door of the house where Paul and Barnabas were, in order to sacrifice to them. But when the apostles saw what they were going to do, they rent their clothes, and running in among the people, cried aloud, that they were mistaken in the object of their worship; that, notwithstanding the miracle they had wrought, they were no more than men; and that the chief end of their preaching was to turn them from these idolatrous practices, to the worship of the only true God, who by his almighty power had made heaven and the capital of the extensive province of Caramania, as it was formerly of Lyeaonia, and the seat of a Turkish beglerberg, or viceroy. It is the place of chief strength and importance in the central parts of Asiatic Turkey, being surrounded by a strong wall of four miles in circumference; but, as is the case with most Eastern cities, much of the enclosed space is waste. It is situated about 120 miles inland from the Mediterranean, on the lake Trogilis.—Hansford.—Ed.

^a That this was a common notion of the heathens is evident, not only from that passage in Homer,

Often the gods, disguised, at pleasure roam
From town to town like men without a home,
To judge the earth, and by experience prove
Who wrong commit, or right and justice love.

Odys. xvii. 485.

and that in Ovid,

A god I glide from high Olympus' top,
And o'er the earth I range in human guise.

but even from the testimony of their philosophers; and therefore we find Cicero endeavouring to prove, that the gods must be of human shape, because they never appeared in any other form. De nat. deorum.—Calmel's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^b The account which St Paul's enemies gave of him, is this,—‘his letters are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible,’ (2 Cor. x. 10.) His discourses indeed were not formed upon the plan of the Greek orators. The vain ornaments, which they were so fond of, as tending only to impair the strength and majesty of the truths which he taught, were by him held in great contempt; for his speech and his preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but with demonstration of the Spirit and power,’ (1 Cor. ii. 4.) St Jerom, who finds some fault with his style, as to its harshness, and want of purity, does nevertheless declare, that, when he reads them every word seems like a clap of thunder, in Catal. Scrip. Eccles. And St Chrysostom, in his book de Sacerdotio, makes mention of the great admiration which his epistles had gained him both among Jews and Gentiles. No wonder then that the people of Lystra, upon hearing his strong and unaffected eloquence, should take him for Mercury, who according to the heathen notion was the constant companion of Jupiter, the teacher of men, and the interpreter of the gods.—Calmel's Commentary.

^c These στήματα, which may be rendered crowns, or garlands, some think were to be put upon the heads of Paul and Barnabas, according to the heathen custom of crowning their gods; but it seems more likely, that they were to adorn the head and neck of the ox or heifer that was to be sacrificed; for so we read in Ovid: ‘A victim, free from blemish, and of most beautiful shape, being also adorned with fillets and gold, is placed before the altar.’

earth, and by his kind providence given all the blessings they enjoyed. But with all these arguments, it was as much as they could do to restrain them from sacrificing.

It was not long, however, before they turned to the other extreme: for some Jews, who had pursued the apostles from Antioch and Iconium, so far instigated the giddy multitude against them, that they took Paul, whom just before they would have adored, and stoned him, and then drew him out of the city, supposing him to be dead; but when the disciples came, probably to inter his body, he rose up and went into the city for that night; but the next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe; where having preached the gospel, and converted many to the faith, they thence returned to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch; in which places, having confirmed the new converts in the belief and profession of Christianity, and, with fasting, and prayer, and imposition of hands, ordained governors in every church, they recommended them to the special protection of God, and so took their leave.

From Antioch they passed through Pisidia, and thence came to Pamphylia; and, having preached to the people at Perga, they went down to Attalia, ^d and from thence returned by sea to Antioch in Syria, whence they had set out about three years before, upon this holy expedition. Here they assembled the church together, ^e and, having given an account of their success, what miracles God had wrought by their hands, and what a large door of faith he, by their ministry, had opened to the Gentiles, they suspended their journeyings for the present, and, for some considerable time took up their abode among the disciples of this place.

While they continued here, some persons, coming from Judea, pretended to teach that there was no salvation without circumcision, ^f and the observance of the ^d Attalia, which takes its name from king Attalus, its founder, and, with a small variation, is still called Statalia, is a city of Pamphylia, which stands upon a fair bay, and is so commodiously seated for trade, that the Turks have preserved it from ruin, and, at this day, are very careful to keep its fortifications and castle in repair.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^e St Luke gives us no number of an account of what passed in the church from St Paul's returning to Antioch in Syria, which was in the 46th, to his deputation to the council at Jerusalem, which was in the 51st year of Christ. How he spent this intermediate time, we cannot tell; but sure we are, that his zeal for the Christian cause would not permit him to be idle; and therefore, we may suppose, that this was the opportunity he took to preach the gospel, not only through the provinces adjacent to Antioch, but through several other places, where Christ had not been named, that he might not build upon another man's foundation; (Rom. xv. 20.) Himself in his second epistle to the Corinthians, acquaints us with many journeyings, and labours, and stripes, and imprisonments, that are not recorded in the book of Acts; particularly he tells us, that five times he had been scourged by the Jews, and three times beaten with rods by the Romans; that thrice he had suffered shipwreck, and a day and a night had been in the deep, tossed to and fro in the sea, upon some plank or broken piece of the ship, (2 Cor. xi. 23.) &c., and a properer time for these sad events to befall him we cannot assign, than where the sacred history has made a vacancy in his life.—Calmel's Commentary.

^f Those who maintained this position were Jews, of the sect of the Pharisees, (Acts xv. 5.) converted to Christianity, but still too zealous for the observance of the law; and their coming immediately from Judea might make it the rather believed, that the necessity of circumcision, in order to salvation, was a tenet of the apostles'. It is to be observed, however, that the Jews themselves were of different opinions in this matter, even as to men's admission into their religion. For some of them would allow those of other nations, who owned the true God, and other legal ceremonies. Paul and Barnabas strongly opposed this doctrine; but, after many conferences and disputations, it was at length proposed, that the decision of the question should be referred to the general assembly of the apostles at Jerusalem. ^a This the whole church readily agreed to; and, having deputed Barnabas and Paul, together with some others of their body, to go with the message, they conducted them part of their way; and the two apostles, in passing through Phœnicia ^b and Samaria, took care to relate what success they had met with in the conversion of the Gentiles, to the great joy and comfort of all the brethren in those parts.

A. M. 4050. A. D. 46; OR, A. M. 5457. A. D. 46, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

When they were come to Jerusalem, they first addressed themselves to Peter, James, and John, the pillars, and principal persons in that place; who received them very kindly; and perceiving, by the account which St Paul gave them, that the ¹ gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to him, as that of the circumcision was to Peter, they ratified it by compact and agreement, that Peter should preach to the Jews and Paul to the Gentiles: and, upon calling of the council, wherein Peter declared his sense of the insufficiency of all legal observances to save those who could expect salvation only through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ; and wherein Paul and Barnabas gave an account of the wonders and miracles which God had enabled them to work in converting the Gentiles, it was finally determined by St James, as bishop of the place, and president of the council, that the Gentiles who were converted to Christianity should not be obliged to submit to the yoke of the law, but only abstain from fornication, ^c and from practised moral duties, to live quietly among them, and, even without circumcision, to be admitted into their religion; whilst others would admit of no such thing. Thus Josephus tells us, that when Izates, the son of Helen, queen of Adiabene, embraced the Jews' religion, Ananias, who converted him, declared, that he might do it without circumcision; but Eleazar, another eminent Jew, maintained, that it was great impiety, in such circumstances, to remain uncircumcised; and this difference of opinion continued among the Jewish converts after their embracing Christianity, some allowing Gentiles to become converts to Christianity, without submitting to circumcision and the Jewish law, whilst others contended, that without circumcision, and the observance of the law, their profession of the Christian faith would not save them.—Calmel's Commentary, and Beausobre's and Whitby's Annotations.

1 Gal. ii. 7.

^a St Paul, in his epistle to the Galatians, lets us into a circumstance that is not recorded in the history of the Acts, viz. that he went up at this time to Jerusalem by revelation, chap. ii. 2. for, as the prophets and teachers at Antioch had before separated him and Barnabas, by revelation, to preach to some of the Gentiles, and they having fulfilled that work, returned to Antioch again, (Acts xiv. 26.) so it is probable, that by another revelation made to the same persons, they were sent up to Jerusalem, as being the fittest to convince those of a contrary persuasion, by declaring what God had wrought by them among the uncircumcised Gentiles, and his acceptance of them without circumcision, or the observance of the law of Moses.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b This was a province of Syria, which, in the times of the New Testament, lay between the two rivers Elutherus to the north, and Chersus, or the Kishon in Scripture, to the south. In the phrase of the gospel it is called the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, because these two towns stood in the southern part of it; and for its great skill in navigation, and the invention of letters, which, according to Herodotus, were brought thence by Cadmus into Greece, is justly celebrated by the ancients.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament, and Whitby's Alphabetical Table.

^c That we are absolutely obliged to abstain from fornication no good Christian can seriously make a matter of dispute; for eating things offered to idols, things strangled, ^d and blood, ^e which, in the present circumstances of the church, were highly necessary. With this decree, which was drawn up in the form of an epistle, Paul and Barnabas were sent back to the church of Antioch; and with them the council joined Judas ^f and Silas, two eminent men of their own number, that, by their testimony of what was transacted at Jerusalem, the false teachers might be silenced, and the believing Gentiles confirmed in the truth. Being arrived at Antioch, they assembled the church, and presented the decretal epistle to them, in the presence of the whole congregation: which when they had read, the Gentile converts rejoiced greatly to find themselves discharged from the burden of the law, and confirmed in their Christian liberty, by an apostolic decree.

While they were in Antioch, Judas and Silas were not idle; but being both men of excellent gifts in the inter-how favourably soever the Gentiles might look upon it, or how much soever it might obtain among the Jews, under the name of polygamy, nothing is more plain, than that fornication was accounted an heinous crime under the Old Testament, and that the wisest of the heathen world always esteemed chastity a virtue. However, since the greatest part of them acted as if they thought fornication a thing indifferent, and in many of their idolatrous festivals made lewdness a necessary and principal ingredient, it hence came to pass, that the council at Jerusalem thought proper to insert this prohibition in their decree.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^d The heathens of this age used the same arts to seduce the Christians, and bring them to their temples, that the Moabites had formerly done to corrupt the Israelites, calling and inviting them to eat of the sacrifices which they had offered to their gods. To this purpose our Saviour, in his letter to the church of Pergamus, makes mention of some who held 'the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols,' (Rev. ii. 14.) Great reason therefore had the council to forbid Christians this profane practice, because, as St Paul expresses his sense of the matter, 'we cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils,' (1 Cor. x. 21.) that is, it is highly unfit that Christians, who eat of the sacrament of the Lord's supper, should defile themselves with meats that have been sacrificed to what the Gentiles call gods, but are in reality no better than devils.—Whitby's Annotations.

^e The Jews had so strong an aversion to blood, that they accounted all who made use of it in food as creatures sadly polluted, and gross transgressors even of the law of nature. The Gentiles, on the contrary, looked upon blood as the most delicious food of their gods, and thought that by eating of it they entered into a more intimate communion with them; and therefore the prohibition of it was necessary for these two reasons: 1st, that no offence might be given to the Jewish converts, who would be loath to converse, much more to join in any religious offices, with persons who indulged themselves in such meats as they detested; and, 2dly, that the Gentile converts might be in no danger of relapsing into idolatry, which they possibly might do, if a toleration to eat things offered to idols were still indulged them.—Beausobre's Annotations, and Calmel's Commentary.

^f It is generally thought, that Judas, who is surnamed Barsabas, was the brother of Joses, or Joseph, who, together with Matthias, was proposed as a candidate for the apostleship, which Judas the traitor by his transgression had forfeited; and Silas is supposed to be the same person, that, under the name of Sylvanus, is mentioned in the title of both St Paul's epistles to the Thessalonians, and whom St Peter, in his first epistle, styles a faithful brother. St Luke says of them both, that 'they were chief men among the brethren,' (Acts xv. 22.) which gives us room to think, that they were of the number of the seventy, and might therefore be sent back with Paul and Barnabas, to carry the decision of the council to Antioch, because Paul and Barnabas, being strenuous assertors of the liberty of the gospel, might otherwise have been suspected by those of the contrary party, who maintained the necessity of circumcision.—Calmel's Commentary.

A. M. 4050. A. D. 46; OR, A. M. 5157. A. D. 46, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

pretation of the Scriptures, they employed their time in confirming believers in the truth of Christianity; and, after a short stay, were with all kindness and civility dismissed by the church in order to return to Jerusalem. But Silas, for some reasons, was unwilling to depart so soon, and chose rather to tarry with Paul and Barnabas, who, with several others of their fraternity, employed themselves in instructing those who had already received the Christian faith, and in preaching it to others, who had not yet embraced it, in this great and populous city.

It was not long after the determination of the council at Jerusalem that Peter came to Antioch; where, using the liberty which the gospel had given him, for some time he conversed familiarly with the Gentile converts, eating with them, and living in the same manner as they did. But when some Jewish Christians, still tenacious of the ceremonial law, came from Jerusalem, for fear of offending or displeasing them, he separated himself from the Gentile converts, and refused to eat with them; whereby he not only confirmed the Jews in their darling opinions, but filled the Gentiles likewise with new doubts and scruples. St Paul, who was not ignorant of what pernicious influence the example of so great an apostle might be, especially when he saw Barnabas carried away with the stream of his dissimulation, was not afraid, even in the face of the whole church, to reprove him sharply, for endeavouring to impose that yoke upon the Gentiles, which he, though a Jew, thought himself at liberty to shake off. But how St Peter received this reproof, we are no where told; and this indeed is the last time that we read of him in the history of the Acts.

It was not long after this that Paul and Barnabas resolved upon visiting the churches which they had lately planted among the Gentiles. To this end Barnabas proposed to take his cousin Mark with them; which Paul would by no means agree to, because he had deserted them in their former journey; so that, after a warm dispute on both sides, they separated ^a from each other; Barnabas, with his nephew, betook himself to Cyprus, which was his native country; and Paul, after he had been recommended to the blessing and assistance of God, by the prayers of the church, made choice of Silas for his companion in his intended visitation of the several places where he had propagated Christianity.

Parting from Antioch, he travelled over the provinces of Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches, and leaving with them copies of the synodical decree which had lately passed in the council at Jerusalem. Thence, very probably, he sailed to Crete, ^b where he planted Christian-

^a From hence we may learn, not only that these great lights in the Christian church were men of the like passions with us, but that God, upon this occasion, did most eminently illustrate the wisdom of his providence, by rendering the frailties of two such eminent servants instrumental to the benefit of his church, since both of them thenceforward employed their extraordinary industry and zeal, singly and apart, which till then had been united and confined to the same place.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^b This is one of the noblest isles in the whole Mediterranean sea, which had once an hundred considerable towns or cities in it, from whence it had the name of Heatonpolis, and, for the goodness of the soil, and temper of the air, was likewise styled Macarius, or Macarionus, 'the happy island;' for though the inland parts of it are very mountainous, yet are they extremely fruitful, especially of vines, called the Muscadine; though not so productive of corn. At present it is commonly called Candia, ity, and, having constituted Titus to be bishop of the place, left him there to regulate such matters as the shortness of his stay would not permit him to do. From Crete he returned to Cilicia, and came to Lystra, where he met with a young man, named Timothy, whose father was a Greek, ^c but his mother Eunice, from whom he had received all the advantages of a pious education, and an extraordinary skill in the sacred writings, was a Jewish convert. Him Paul designed to make the companion of his travels, and a special instrument in the ministry of the gospel: and, therefore, being willing, in indifferent matters, to accommodate himself to the humour of some particular men, he caused him to be circumcised, as knowing very well what a mighty prejudice the want of that rite would have been in the opinion and estimation of the Jews. ^d

From Lystra, Paul, with his companions, passed through Phrygia ^e and Galatia, in which country he was ^f from its principal town, which bears that name; it is situated over against the mouth of the Ægean sea, or Archipelago; and while it continued in the hands of the Venetians, was an archbishop's see, great, rich, and populous; but since it came into the possession of the Turks, which was in the year 1669, it has lost all marks of its former happiness and grandeur.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.—See also Scripture Gazetteer, Edinr. 1837.—Ed.

^c The law of Moses, as Grotius understands it, forbade the Jewish males to marry with women of another religion; but did not forbid a Jewish woman to marry with a Gentile, even as Esther did with Ahasuerus, if so be he was a man of piety and moral honesty. To this purpose he observes, that Ezra, when he went about a reformation in this matter, made inquiry only into those males who had taken strange wives, (chap. ix. and x.) but none at all into the women who had taken strange husbands. It is certain, however, from Josephus, that, in his days, the Jews looked upon both these practices as contrary to the true interpretation of their law, and therefore he calls Drusilla's marriage with Felix a manifest contempt of it.—Antiq. b. ii. c. 5.; and Whitby's Annotations.

^d The reason is added by the historian, (Acts xvi. 3.) namely, that he might not offend the Jews, who concluded that Timothy was uncircumcised, because his father was a Greek, and who would not listen to the doctrine of any uncircumcised person. The decree in the preceding chapter only pronounced circumcision not to be necessary to the Gentile converts, but it might occasionally be expedient; and though Christians are freed from the yoke of the Mosaic law, St Paul conformed to it here, and (ch. xxi. 20.—26.) in order to conciliate the Jews, and to promote the success of his preaching, agreeably to the principles laid down in 1 Cor. ix. 19, &c. In other circumstances the apostle steadily resisted every attempt to impose the rites and ordinances of the Mosaic law, (Gal. ii. 3—5. v. 2.)—Holden's Christian Expositor.—Ed.

^e It is a province of Asia Minor, having Bithynia to the north, Galatia to the east, Lycia to the south, and Mysia to the west. The inhabitants of this country, who are said to have been the inventors of augury, and other kinds of divination, were anciently more superstitious than the other Asiatics; as appears from the rites which they used in the sacrifices of Cybele, and other heathen goddesses. They were noted for their effeminacy and lightness of conversation, as well as for their servile and stupid temper, which gave occasion to these proverbs, 'the Phrygians are long in getting wisdom,' and 'the Phrygians become better by stripes.'—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.—Phrygia was formerly governed by kings of its own, but it has successively been subjected by the Syrians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, and Turks.—Ed.

^f It is a province of Asia Minor, bounded on the west by Phrygia, on the east by the river Halys, on the north by Paphlagonia, and on the south by Lycaonia. It took its name from Galate, or the Gauls, who under their captain Leonorius, as Strabo informs us, left their own country in Europe, and, having ranged over Italy and Greece, passed into the Asiatic continent, and brought a great part of it under their command; but being entertained with great kindness and veneration, ¹ as if he had been 'an angel sent from heaven;' and hence he intended to have continued his progress in the Proconsular Asia, but that, by a particular revelation, he was forbidden as yet to preach the gospel there. Being therefore come to Mysia, ^a and attempting in vain to go into Bithynia, ^b he came to Troas, ^c where he had a vision commanding him to direct his course for Macedonia, ^d and broken by Attalus, king of Pergamus, and driven out of other parts, they were at last confined to this province; where, in a short time, they established their own language, which, as St Jerom informs us, in his Commentaries on St Paul's epistle to the Galatians, was in use in his time, and very much like that which the people of Trier or Treves, in the European Gaul, are known to speak.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.—In this country stood the ancient city Troy, as also that of Pergamos, one of the seven churches of Asia. Under the Romans it was made a province, and called Hellespontus.—Mansford.—Ed.

A. M. 4055. A. D. 51, OR, A. M. 5462. A. D. 51, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

¹ Gal. iv. 14.

^a It is a small province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Bithynia, on the east by Phrygia, on the west by Troas, and on the south by the river Hermus. It had its name very probably from the great quantity of beech-trees which grew there; but why its inhabitants came to be accounted base and contemptible, even to a proverb, as Tully, in his oration for Flaccus, has noted, we cannot tell.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^b This was a country in the northern part of Asia Minor, bounded by the Euxine on the north, by the Thracian Bosphorus and the Propontis on the north-west and west, by Phrygia and Mysia on the south, and by the Sangarius river, now called Sacaria, and Paphlagonia, on the east. This country is filled with mountains covered with ship timber, and its valleys and plains are fruitful, particularly in oil. The places of importance in the province are Prusa, Nice, Nicomedia, Chalcedon, Libyssa, and Therma, two of which are celebrated in ecclesiastical history for the councils of the church held in them. Bithynia was anciently an independent kingdom, but no event of any importance occurs in its history except the treacherous conduct of one of its monarchs, named Prusias, who basely delivered the illustrious Hamulib to the Romans. His great-grandson, Nicomedes IV., was the last king. He died about seventy-five years before the Christian era, and bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans, who reduced it to a province. It now forms one of the districts of Turkish Anatolia, and is the nearest province to Turkey in Europe, being separated from it only by the very narrow strait of the Thracian Bosphorus opposite Constantinople, on which is situated the suburb called the Scutari, a short distance from Chalcedon, containing upwards of 30,000 inhabitants. A considerable proportion of the population of Bithynia belong to the Greek and Armenian churches. This country was anciently called Behrycia. The Bythinii from Thrace gave it the name of Bithynia.—Scripture Gazetteer, Edinburgh, 1837.

^c This was a small country belonging to Phrygia Minor, according to Strabo, and lying on the west of Mysia, upon the Hellespont. It took its name from its principal city, which was a sea-port, about four miles from the situation of old Troy, so famous in the works of Homer. This city was built by Lysimachus, one of Alexander's captains, who peopled it from the neighbouring places, and called it Alexandria, or Troas Alexandri, in honour of his master, who himself indeed began the work, but did not live to bring it to perfection; but in process of time, it lost that name, and both city and country was called Troas only.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^d This is a large province of Greece, bounded on the north by the mountains of Hæmus, on the south by Epirus and Achaia, on the east by the Ægean sea, and on the west by the Ionian and Adriatic seas. Its ancient name was Emmathia; but, from the kings of Macedon it was afterwards called Macedonia; and became famous in all histories, as being the third kingdom, which, under Alexander the Great, obtained the empire of the world, and had no less than an hundred and fifty nations under its command.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table.—The kingdom of Macedon continued till the year 168 B. C., when Perseus, the last king, was defeated by the Roman general Paulus Æmilius, where St Luke seems to have joined him, and, for ever after, to have been his inseparable companion.

Embarking therefore at Troas, they touched upon the island Samothracia, ^e and the next day landed at Neapolis, ^f a port in Macedonia, from whence they travelled a few miles to Philippi, ^g a Roman colony. A little distant ^h from the city, the Jews had a 'Proseuche,' or place of devotion, ⁱ whither the apostle and his company used and his kingdom made a province of the Roman empire; in which state it was in the time of the apostles, when St Paul was called by a vision to visit it, (Acts xvi. 9.) Thessalonica was then the capital city; but the province appears to have been further sub-divided into four parts or sections, each with its chief city or capital.—Mansford.—Ed.

^e It is a small island in the Ægean sea, lying west from Troas, over against the coast of Thrace, from whence it has its name, to distinguish it from the isle of Samos, situated over against Ionia. At present it is called Samothracia, and is said to have more commodious harbours than any other island in this sea.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^f This sea-port, which stood very near to Thrace, belonged at first to that province, but was afterwards taken into Macedonia.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^g Philippi was a city of Macedonia, on the Ægean Sea; and as it is situated east of the River Strymon, it is included in the division which anciently belonged to Thrace. In Acts xvi. 11, 12. Luke says, 'We came to Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony,'—a passage which has given much embarrassment to critics and commentators; Thessalonica being the capital of Macedonia. Mr Milner supposes the word Περον to apply to the situation of the city; being the first which St Paul arrived at in his way from Neapolis. But Mr Horne gives a different and more satisfactory interpretation of the above passage; which he says, is more correctly rendered thus: 'Philippi, a city of the first part of Macedonia,' or of 'Macedonia Prima.' It is well known that Macedonia underwent various changes under the Roman government; and more particularly appears to have been divided into four parts or sections, under the name of first, second, third, and fourth. In proof of which, medals have been found, chiefly of silver, and bearing this inscription: ΜΑΚΕΔΟΝΩΝ ΠΡΩΤΗΣ, or the first part of Macedonia. (See Fragments to Calmet's Dictionary.) Medals have also been found of Macedonia Secunda, (see Calmet,) and Quarta, (see Wielhamer, Animadversiones in Nummos;) but not of the third; though its existence is of course sufficiently implied. Thus have the researches of the antiquary converted this apparent difficulty into an evidence both of the extreme accuracy of St Luke, and of the time in which he lived and wrote. St Luke further says that Philippi was a colony; to express which he used the word κολωνια, derived from the Latin colonia, instead of the corresponding Greek word αποικια, another proof of his accuracy; for although we have no historical account of the colonization of this place by the Romans, the discovery of ancient medals again assists us, particularly one which explicitly states that Julius Cæsar bestowed the dignity and privileges of a colony on the city of Philippi, which were afterwards confirmed by Augustus. Philippi has a peculiar claim to our attention, as it was the first city on the shores of Europe in which the gospel was preached. Philippi was anciently called Datus, but received its new name from Philip, the father of Alexander; who fortified it, and made it a frontier town against the Thracians. It is celebrated in profane history for two important battles fought in its vicinity: the one, between Cæsar and Pompey; and the other, between Marc Antony and Augustus, on the one side, and Brutus and Cassius on the other.—Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer.

^h Because the laws, very probably, would not permit them to exercise a strange religion within the city.—Whitby's Annotations.

ⁱ The Jewish proseuchai were places of prayer, in some circumstances similar to, in others different from their synagogues: the latter were generally in cities, and were covered places. (Stehelin's Traditions of the Jews, vol. ii. p. 246.) Whereas for the most part the proseuchai were out of the cities, on the banks of rivers, having no covering, except perhaps the shade of some trees, or covered galleries. Their vicinity to water was for the to resort, for the exercise of their religion, and the preaching of the gospel to such as frequented the place. Here they found several devout women; and, among others, one named Lydia, a dealer in purple; whom when they had converted, they baptized, as likewise her whole family; and she in return gave them an invitation to lodge at her house, during the time of their abode in that city.

A. M. 4056. A. D. 52; OR, A. M. 5463. A. D. 52, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

As they were going to this place of devotion, they were frequently followed by a maid-servant, who being actuated by a spirit of divination, ^a proclaimed them to be, as indeed they were, the ^b servants of the most high God, and preachers of the way to salvation. But Paul, well knowing that the Christian religion needed not the testimony of Satan to confirm it, commanded the demon, in the name of Jesus Christ, to come out of her. The demon was forced to obey; but immediately raised a storm against the apostles. For, when the masters of the maid saw, that, by this miracle, all their prospect of future gain from her divinations was gone, they apprehended Paul and Silas, and having brought them before the magistrates, to them they insinuated, that as they were Jews, ^c there was reason to believe that they convenience of these frequent washings and ablutions which were introduced among them.—Vide Lardner's Credibility of Gospel History, vol. i. c. 3. and Prideaux's Connection, vol. i. part i. b. vi. p. 287.—Ed.

^a 'A certain damsel possessed with a spirit of divination,' Greek, 'having a spirit of Python,'—πνευμα πιδωνος. Πιδων was properly an appellation of Apollo. But, as he was the God of divination, it came to be applied to soothsayers, conjurers, and those who pretended to evoke spirits. Now as ventriloquism was a most useful art to persons of that profession, they generally acquired more or less of it: hence the word is sometimes explained to mean ventriloquist in the Greek lexicographers. Now whether this girl was a ventriloquist, has been much debated; but the negative is the view adopted, and I think rightly, by the most eminent commentators. (See Deyling, Wolf, and Kuin.) There is no sufficient reason to suppose so from the name, and still less from the circumstances. This is closely connected with another, and more important question,—'whether she was a pretender to the gift of divination.' This also has been by Deyling, Wolf, Welch, and Biscoe, decided in the negative. There is somewhat to countenance the opinion of certain eminent recent commentators, that she was a lunatic, who, like Joanna Southcote, fancied that she was inspired to foretell future events. See Rec. Syn. and Townsend in loc., in his Dissertation on the nature of the Spirit of Divination in the Pythoness; whence it will appear that this notion involves insuperable difficulties, being inconsistent with the view taken by the sacred writer; which requires us to suppose, as the ancient, and most modern commentators have done, that the girl was 'possessed with an evil spirit,' which enabled her occasionally to foretell future events.—Bloomfield's Greek Testament.

^b Why she did this, or under what pretence, the sacred writer has not informed us. Various conjectures have been formed of the reason why this was done. It may have been, (1.) That as she prophesied for gain, she supposed that Paul and Silas would reward her if she publicly proclaimed that they were the servants of God. Or, (2.) Because she was conscious that an evil spirit possessed her, and that she feared that Paul and Silas would expel that spirit; and that by proclaiming them to be the servants of God, she hoped to conciliate their favour. Or, (3.) More probably, it was because she saw evident tokens of their being sent from God, and that their doctrine would prevail; and by proclaiming this she hoped to acquire more authority, and a higher reputation for being herself inspired. Comp. Mark v. 7.—Barnes on the Acts.—Ed.

^c At the first appearance of the Christian religion, the Gentiles looked upon it as no other than a particular sect, or reformation of Judaism; because at that time, those who professed it, were descended from the same stock, born in the same country, observed in the main the same laws, adored the same God, and re-intended to introduce a religion and form of worship contrary to the law of the Roman empire. Upon this slight occasion, the magistrates ordered them, though unconvicted, to be scourged; ^d and, having committed them to close prison, gave the jailor strict charge to keep them safe; who thereupon thrust them into the inner dungeon, and made their feet fast in the stocks, ^e but in vain was all his contrivance. While the apostles, at midnight, were singing hymns and praises to God, an earthquake suddenly shook the foundations of the prison, the doors flew open, and their chains fell off. The jailor, awakened at the noise, and supposing that the prisoners had made their escape, drew his sword, ^f with an intent to kill himself; but being assured by St Paul to the contrary, he came trembling in; and, having taken the two apostles home to his own house, he washed their wounds, entertained them courteously, and gave such evident proof of his faith and repentance, as not only to be baptized himself, but to make his whole family likewise become proselytes to this persecuted religion.

The magistrates next morning reflecting upon what they had done, would have dismissed the apostles privately: but the apostles refused to accept of their discharge, alleging, that they were not only innocent persons, but denizens ^g of Rome; that as they had been ceived the same scriptures. This was enough to denigrate them Jews. And accordingly Suetonius, in his life of Claudius, c. 25. tells us, that the emperor banished all the Jews out of Rome, because they were always raising tumults at the instigation of one Chrestus; for so he calls our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. And, in like manner, the people of Philippi, to make Paul and Silas more odious to the magistrates, did not stick to acquaint them, that they were Jews, and intended some innovations in religion. For though, as yet, there was no express edict against Christians, yet there was an old law of the Romans, which required them to worship the gods of their own country only, (Tully, De leg. b. ii.) And yet Christianity dissuaded them from this: 'for we preach unto you,' says St Paul, 'that ye should turn from these vanities to the living God, who made heaven and earth,' (Acts xiv. 15.)—Cabinet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^d It was usual for the Roman magistrates to command the lictors to rend open the clothes of the criminal, that he might the more easily be beaten with rods. No care was taken of the garments on these occasions, but they were suddenly and with violence rent open. Wetstein, among other instances, cites from Phtarch in Publ. p. 99: 'But the lictors immediately taking the young men, tore off their clothes, and beat their bodies with rods or twigs.' Thus were Paul and Silas treated in this instance.—Ed.

^e It is generally supposed that these were the cippi, or large pieces of wood used by the Romans, which not only loaded the legs of prisoners, but sometimes distended them in a very painful manner; so that it is highly probable the situation of Paul and Silas here might be made more painful than that of an offender sitting in the stocks, as used among us, especially if (as is very possible), they lay with their bare back, so lately scourged, on the hard or dirty ground; which renders their joyful frame, expressed by songs of praise, so much the more remarkable. Beza explains it of the numclike, in which both the feet and the neck were fastened, in the most uneasy posture that can well be imagined.—Doddridge in loc.—Ed.

^f Every jailor was made responsible for his prisoner, under the same penalty to which the prisoner himself was exposed. The jailor, awakening, and finding the prison-doors open, taking it for granted that all the prisoners had made their escape, and that he must lose his life on the account, chose rather to die by his own hand than by that of others. For it was customary among the heathens, when they found death inevitable, to take away their own lives. This custom was applauded by their philosophers, and sanctioned by some of their greatest men.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

^g Silas might likewise be a Roman citizen; but, as St Paul illegally scourged and committed, their delivery should be as public as was the injury, and attended with a solemn retraction of what they had done. The magistrates, when they heard that they insisted on their privileges, were not a little afraid; and therefore repairing to the prison, with all submission, desired them to leave the city; which the apostles, after some conference with the converts in Lydia's house, were not averse to do.

A. M. 4056. A. D. 52; OR, A. M. 5463. A. D. 52, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

From Philippi, Paul and his companions, passing through Amphipolis,^d and Apollonia,^e came to Thessalonica,^f the metropolis of Macedonia, where he disputed was undoubtedly one, this was enough to justify the language which he uses. The only dispute is, how he came by this privilege? And to this some reply, that the city where he was born, for its faithful adherence to Julius Cæsar, was by him made a Roman colony, and all its inhabitants admitted to the usual rights and immunities of Romans. Others contend, that though Tarsus might, at that time, be made a free town: yet it was never a Roman colony, until the reign either of Caracalla or Heliogabalus; and that therefore the right of a Roman citizen was not common to all the people of the place, but only to some particular persons who might purchase it, as a title of honour, for them and their heirs for ever; of whom they suppose St Paul's father to be one; and that, upon this foundation, his son might very properly say that he was born free. However this be, it is certain, that the quality of a Roman citizen was highly esteemed, especially in all Roman colonies, whereof Philippi was one. Every injury offered to such a one was looked upon as an affront against the majesty of the whole people of Rome; to bind him was a violation of the law, and much more to have him beaten; but to be scourged and bound, without being first legally heard and tried, was not only against the Roman, but against the laws of all nations; and the more public any such injury is, the greater is its aggravation, and the more solemn should its reparation be.—Beausobre's Annotations, Cabnet's Commentary, and Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

^a Amphipolis, called in modern times Crisopoli, and situated in European Turkey, was a city of ancient Macedonia or Thrace, and subject to the Macedonian kings. It stood on the banks of the river Strymon, which nearly surrounded it, in the immediate vicinity of Ἐννιά Ὀδοί, or the 'nine ways,' a spot so called from a number of roads which met there from different parts of Thrace. It was built by Cimon the Athenian about 470 years before the Christian era, and peopled with upwards of 10,000 Athenians, who settled there. This city was a source of great annoyance to Philip, king of Macedonia, who drove the Athenians from it, and allowed the citizens to form a republic. It was afterwards taken by Brasidas, the Lacedæmonian general, but Philip again recovered it. The Athenians, nevertheless, always considered Amphipolis as belonging to them, and Philip promised to restore it to them, when it was finally ceded to him by a treaty of peace. The spot on which the ruins of Amphipolis are still to be traced, is called Jenikevi. 'The position of Amphipolis,' observes Colonel Leake, 'is one of the most important in Greece. It stands in a pass which traverses the mountains bordering the Strymonic Gulf, and it commands the only easy communication from the coast of that Gulf into the great Macedonian plains, which extend for sixty miles from beyond Μελένικο to Philippi.' There is a miserable place near it called Emboli by the Turks.—Scripture Gazetteer.—ED.

^b This is another city of Macedonia, lying between Amphipolis and Thessalonica.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table.

^c A large and populous city and seaport of Macedonia, the capital of one of the four districts into which the Romans divided that country after its conquest by Paulus Æmilius. It was situated on the Therman bay, and was anciently called Therme; but, being rebuilt by Philip the father of Alexander, after his victory over the Thessalians, it then received the name of Thessalonica. At the time of writing the epistle to the Thessalonians, Thessalonica was the residence of the proconsul who governed the province of Macedonia, and of the questor who had the charge of the imperial revenues. Besides being the seat of government, this port carried on an extensive commerce, which caused a great influx of strangers from all quarters; so that Thessalonica was remarkable for the number, wealth, and learning of its inhabitants. The Jews were extremely numerous in the synagogues of the Jews three sabbath-days successively, proving, from the predictions of the Old Testament, that the Messiah was to suffer, and rise again, and that the blessed Jesus was this Messiah. Great numbers, especially of religious proselytes, and several women of the better rank and quality, were converted at his preaching: but the unbelieving Jews raised a tumult in the city, and went to the house of Jason,^d where St Paul lodged; but not finding him there, they seized Jason, and carried him before the magistrates, where they accused him of harbouring in his house persons disaffected to the Roman government, and who set up one Jesus in opposition to Cæsar. He however, upon security for his good behaviour, was dismissed; and Paul and Silas, for fear of greater disturbances, were, by the brethren, conveyed next night to Berea.^e Here they found the people in a better disposition to entertain the Christian doctrine, but yet not willing to take it merely upon the apostles' word, until they had examined the scriptures, and found that their preaching agreed very well with the characters therein delivered of the Messiah; and then great numbers, both of men and women of distinction, were converted; but the Jews of Thessalonica, hearing of their success, came down to Berea, and there raised such disturbances, that the brethren thought proper to send Paul privately away to Athens,^f while Silas and Timothy continued some time in the place to confirm the new believers, but, after that, had orders to follow him as soon as possible.

While Paul waited for his company at Athens, he went about several parts of the city, to see the rarities of it, and wherever he came, found abundance of superstition & ignorant zeal, even for deities that themselves here. The modern name of this place is Salonichi; it is the chief port of modern Greece, and has a population of sixty thousand persons, twelve thousand of whom are Jews. According to Dr Clarke, who has given a very interesting account of the antiquities, present state, and commerce of Thessalonica, this place is the same now it was then; a set of turbulent Jews constituted a very principal part of its population: and, when St Paul came hither from Philippi, where the gospel was first preached, to communicate the 'glad tidings' to the Thessalonians, the Jews were sufficient in number to 'set all the city in an uproar.'—Horne's Introduction.

^d The Greeks say, that he was afterwards made bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia.

^e This was likewise another great and populous city of Macedonia, lying to the south of Thessalonica, and almost directly in the way of Athens.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^f This was one of the most renowned cities in the world, situated on the gulf of the Ægean sea, which comes up to the isthmus of the Peloponese, or Morea, in that district of Greece properly so called, which was named Attica, and was the parent of that dialect which is esteemed the purest and finest Greek. The city itself was the great seat of arts and sciences, and as Cicero will have it, the fountain whence civility, learning, religion, and laws, were derived to all other nations; so universally flocked to by those that had the least kindness for the muses and good manners, that he who had not seen Athens was accounted a block; he who having seen it, and not in love with it, a dull stupid ass; and he, who, after he had seen it could be willing to leave it, fit for nothing but to be a pack-horse.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament and Cave's Lives of the Apostles. Our space will not permit us to insert a lengthened account of Athens here; but the inquiring reader may consult Mansford and Scripture Gazetteer, Edinburgh, 1837.—ED.

^g Several of their own writers have made their remark, that Athens had greater numbers of deities and idols than all Greece besides; and Strabo, in particular, notes, that the Athenians were not more fond of strangers than forward to comply with any knew nothing of. This therefore he esteemed no improper place and time for him to apply himself to the discharge of his great work; and accordingly, he not only disputed with the Jews and proselytes in the synagogues every sabbath-day, but took all opportunities, wherever he met with a convenient auditory, and this he seldom missed of in the public forum, where people of all sorts daily resorted to hear and tell news, which was the great business of their lives, to instruct them in the coming of the Messias, and in the doctrine of a resurrection and a future state.

A. M. 4056. A. D. 52; OR, A. M. 5463. A. D. 52, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

Athens was, at this time, the great academy of the Roman empire, and abounded with philosophers of all sects; but those which St Paul had chiefly to deal with were the Epicureans ^a and the Stoics, who treated him with a great deal of scorn and contempt; while others looked upon him as a setter-up of new gods, supposing Jesus, and Anastasis, or the resurrection which he preached, to be two new unheard-of deities, and therefore brought him before their famous senate at Areopagus. ^b Here, in a most excellent discourse, he endeavoured to convince them of their present errors and delusions, and to inform them who that true God was, whom they, under false notions, blindly worshipped. 'The deity to whom they had dedicated an altar, under the title of 'the unknown God,' ^c was no other, he told them, than the great God; the creator of all things, the supreme governor and ruler of the world; that, as he was infinite in all perfections, it was not to be supposed that he could be confined within any temple or human fabric, that any image could be made to represent him, or that he could stand in need of their gifts or sacrifices, who is the sole fountain of all the blessings they enjoyed; that it was entirely from him that they had either life, motion, or existence, as one of their own poets, ^d by calling them his offspring, acknowledged; and therefore incongruous it was to think, that their creator could be the work of their hands, as every image of gold, silver, or stone was; that though his divine patience had for a long time borne with men's blind idolatries, yet now he expected a general repentance and reformation from the novelties in religion, and ready to entertain any foreign deities and rites of worship.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

^a The Epicureans were practically Atheists,—since they held that the world was neither created by God, nor under the direction of his providence. Pleasure they accounted the summum bonum, and virtue to be practised only for the sake of pleasure, not for its own sake. They maintained that the soul was material, like the body, and would perish with it, leaving nothing to be either hoped or feared after death. As to the Stoics, they did, indeed, believe in the existence of a God, but held such chimerical notions of his nature, attributes, and providence, as rendered that belief almost nugatory. They maintained, that both God and man were bound by a necessitas fatalis; that the wise man yielded in no respect to God; of whom they believed that his nature was fire, and diffused throughout the world. On the condition of the soul after death, and on the existence of a state of rewards and punishments, they varied in opinion; but all denied the immortality of a future state. Nay, some thought that, sooner or later, the soul merged in the celestial fire of the Deity. Thus while the former denied the existence, or at least providence, of God; the latter, though professing to believe both,—yet, by ascribing all human events to fate, destroyed the foundation of all religion as much as the former.

It is obvious that both the above systems were as far as possible removed from the doctrines of Christianity; and therefore it is no wonder that the latter should have been both unaccountable and unacceptable to these philosophers. There were, besides, two other sects, the Platonists, and the Peripatetics, the latter of whom probably came not near Paul, since their places of discussion were far removed. The opinions of the former made far nearer approaches than those of the other sects to the doctrines of Christianity; and these probably formed the far greater part of those who gave a qualified approbation of Paul's doctrines, by proposing to 'hear him again,' on the subject of the immortality of the soul.—Bloomfield's Gr. Test.—Ed.

^b This was a place in Athens, where the senate usually assembled; and took its name, as some think, from ἄεως, which is the same as Mars, the god of war, who was the first person that was judged here for having killed Apollo's son. But, as ἄεως does sometimes signify fighting, murder, or violence of any kind, and πυργος is properly a rock, or rising hill, it therefore seems to denote a court situated upon an eminence, as the Areopagus was, where causes of murder, &c. were tried. This court, at present, is out of the city, but in former times it stood almost in the middle of it. Its foundations, which are still standing, are built with square stones of a prodigious size, in the form of a semicircle, and support a terrace, or platform, of about an hundred and forty paces, which was the court where this senate was held. In the midst of it there was a tribunal cut in a rock, and all about were seats, cut likewise in stone, where the senate heard causes in the open air, without any covering, and, as some say, in the night-time, that they might not be moved to compassion at the sight of any criminal that was brought before them. For this judicature was so famous for its uprightness, and held by all in such esteem and veneration, that when the Romans had conquered Greece, and sent their proconsuls to rule there, it was no uncommon thing for them to refer difficult causes to the judgment of the Areopagites. After the loss of their liberty, however, the authority of this senate, which used before to determine in all causes both civil and religious, declined apace; so that, in our apostle's time, the Areopagus was not so much a court of judicature, as a common rendezvous, where all curious and inquisitive persons who spent their time in nothing else, but either in hearing, or telling some new thing, were accustomed to meet, (Acts xvii. 21.) But though their power, in other matters, was greatly impaired; yet they seem still to have retained the privilege of canonizing all gods that were allowed public worship; and therefore St Paul was brought before them as an asserter and preacher of such a deity as they had not yet admitted among them.—Calmet's Commentary, Beausobre's and Hammond's Annotations.

^c That the Athenians, in their public places, had altars without any names on them, and others inscribed to unknown gods, or demons, is evident from the testimony of Laërtius, who informs us, that when a great plague raged at Athens, and several means had been attempted for the removal of it, they were advised by Epimenides, the philosopher, to build an altar, and dedicate it, τῷ ἀγνωστῷ θεῷ, 'to the proper and peculiar God,' to whom sacrifices were due. In Vita Epimen. (b. 11.) And the Athenians, as Chrysostom supposes, not knowing by what name to call him, erected an altar with this inscription, ΘΕΟΙΣ ΑΣΙΑΣ, ΚΑΙ ΕΥΡΩΠΗΣ, ΚΑΙ ΑΙΘΙΩΣ; ΘΕῶ ΑΓΝΩΣΤῶ ΚΑΙ ΞΕΝῶ: 'To the gods of Asia, Europe and Africa; to the strange and unknown God;' whereby, as some imagine, the Athenians intended the God of the Jews, who had given such wonderful deliverances to his own people. Nor is this conjecture unreasonable, considering that the writings of Plato, Pythagoras, and many others, are a plain proof, that the scriptures had been read by their philosophers, though not being able to comprehend his divine nature and attributes, they might call him the unknown God, in conformity perhaps to the Hebrews themselves, who held the name of their God in great secrecy and veneration, and, from the mouth of the prophet, had received it as one of his distinguished titles, 'Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Saviour, (Isa. xlv. 15.)—Hammond's Annotations, and Cave's Lives of the Apostles.—See an able note on this subject in Bloomfield's Greek Test. Acts xvii. 23.—Ed.

^d The poet whom St Paul means was Aratus, born in Cilicia, and consequently his countryman; and what he attributes to Jupiter, the apostle applies to the true God: 'we are his offspring.' This indeed was no argument to the Epicurean auditors, who held the poets in great contempt, because on all occasions they introduced the gods and taught the separate existence of human souls; but it was of great weight to the common people, who paid a mighty veneration to the poets, from whose world; especially since, by the publication of the gospel, he had fully evinced a future judgment, had appointed the holy Jesus to administer that judgment, and given us sufficient assurance of such his appointment, by having raised him from the dead.⁷ But no sooner had he mentioned the resurrection, than some of the philosophers^a mocked and derided him, whilst others^b expressed their desire to hear him upon the same subject another time: and the good effect of his discourse was, that it converted several of the best rank and quality, among whom was Dionysius, ^c one of the senators of the Areopagus, and Damaris, whom the ancients, not improbably, account his wife.

A. M. 4056. A. D. 52; OR, A. M. 5463. A. D. 52, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

From Athens St Paul departed to Corinth, ^d where he works some of the greatest philosophers then living were to borrow citations, thereby to confirm and adorn their discourses. To the honour of human learning, therefore, we may observe, that in the New Testament, the Holy Ghost is pleased three several times to make mention of the heathen poets; of Aratus here, (Acts xvii. 2, 8,) of Menander, (1 Cor. xv. 33.) and of Epimenides.—Beausobre's and Burkitt's Annotations, and Bentley's Sermons at Boyle's Lectures.

^a These were the Epicureans, who believed no resurrection, no immortality of the soul, nor any future judgment, which St Paul here asserts.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b These were the Stoics, who maintained an conflagration and reviviscence of the world; held that souls might live long, though not always, in another state; and allowed something of future recompences, though with great fluctuation.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c The name of Dionysius the Areopagite became very celebrated in after ages; but it was principally in consequence of some voluminous writings, which have been quoted as written by him, but which are undoubtedly spurious, and were perhaps composed as late as the fourth century. Little or nothing is known authentically of Dionysius, except the brief notice of him which is found in the Acts of the Apostles; but a bishop of Corinth, who lived within a hundred years of this time, speaks of him as having been the first bishop of Athens: from which we may safely conclude that the Athenian Christians were committed to his care. The church of Athens continued to flourish for a long time, and we know the names of some of its bishops in the second century; so that there may have been good reasons for the memory of Dionysius being held in such esteem. Paul does not appear to have resided long at Athens: but, while he was at Corinth, he was at no great distance off; and the Athenian converts may have had the benefit of his counsel, if he did not occasionally visit them in person.—Burton's History of the Church.—Ed.

^d Corinth was a large and wealthy city of Greece, the metropolis of Achaia, and seated on the isthmus of the same name which joins the Morea to the continent. Its favourable situation gave rise to the cultivation of trade by the inhabitants; from which they acquired great wealth. It was destroyed in the year 116 B. C. by the Romans; when, during the conflagration, various metals in a fused state accidentally running together, gave rise to the composition called Æs Corinthium, or Corinthian brass. It was, however, rebuilt a hundred years after by Julius Cæsar; who planted a Roman colony there, and made it the residence of the pro-consul of Achaia. Like all other cities advantageously situated for trade, it soon regained its former prosperity; and as science and the arts generally follow in the train of commercial wealth, here were many celebrated artists and philosophers: whence the address of St Paul to them, 'Ye are rich, ye are wise and honourable.' The order of architecture chiefly used in this city, gave the name of Corinthian to that style so called. The manners of the citizens were particularly corrupt: they were indeed infamous to a proverb. The Isthmian Games were held in the vicinity of the city; which gave occasion to the allusion of St Paul, in the ninth chapter of his first epistle. In the centre of the city also was a celebrated temple of Venus, a part of whose worship consisted in prostitution: an example which gave the Corinthians very lax ideas on the illicit intercourse of the sexes. Corinth also possessed numerous schools of philosophy and rhetoric; in which, as at Alexandria, found a certain Jew, named Aquila, ^e lately come from Italy, with Priscilla his wife, because the emperor Claudius, towards the latter end of his reign, had made an edict ^f to banish all the Jews from Rome; and, having instructed them in the Christian faith, he took up his lodgings, and wrought with them, for they by profession were tent-makers ^g as well as himself, and every sabbath-day he preached in the synagogues, labouring to convince both Jews and Greeks, that Jesus was the true Messias.

Before Paul departed from Athens, Timothy, according to his request, came to him from Berea, and brought him an account, ¹ that the new Christians at Thessalonica had been under great persecution ever since he left them. This obliged Paul to send him back again into Macedonia, in order to establish and comfort the brethren under their afflictions; which when Timothy had done, he took Silas along with him, and returned from Thessalonica with the joyful news of the steadfast adherence to the truth which that church had shown in all its distresses. This was a matter of no small consolation to the apostle; who thereupon wrote his first epistle to the Thessalonians; ² 'wherein he highly applauds their courage and zeal, in the belief of the Christian religion, and exhorts them to a noble constancy and perseverance amidst their afflictions; wherein he commends their the purity of the faith, by an easy and natural process, became early corrupted. Corinth is now in a most ruinous state, consisting only of a few wretched huts. The situation is also said to be extremely unhealthy.—Mansford.—See Edinr. Scrip. Gaz. Art. Athens.—Ed.

¹ 1 Thes. iii. 1, &c.

Ibid. passim.

^e Aquila was a native of Pontus, in Asia Minor, and, together with his wife Priscilla, who is sometimes called Prisca, was made a convert to the Christian religion by St Paul at Antioch. When the apostle left that city, in order to return to Jerusalem, these two persons accompanied him as far as Ephesus, where he left them for some time to preach the gospel, and, by their example and instruction, to confirm the faithful in that church. Here it was, that they did him singular service, and for his life laid down their own necks, as himself acknowledges, (Rom. xvi. 4.) When he wrote his epistle to the Romans, they were returned to Rome, because he therein salutes them with great commendations; but when he wrote his second epistle to Timothy, they were come back to Ephesus; because in it he desires him to salute them in his name, (2 Tim. iv. 19.) What became of them after this, we have no certain account, but it is supposed, that they continued at Ephesus until the time of their death, which, according to the Roman martyrologies, is set down on the eighth of July.—Calmet's Commentary and Dictionary.

^f Suetonius in his life of Claudius, makes the occasion of this decree to have been the tumults which the Jews, or Christians, who went under the notion of Jews, were perpetually fomenting in Rome. But as we find nothing of this in any other historian, it is rather supposed that this severity proceeded from the behaviour of some thieves in Judea, who had assaulted a servant of the emperor's, named Stephen, taken from him the imperial baggage, and killed the Roman troops that were appointed to guard it; as both Tacitus, in his Annals, b. xii. and Josephus, in his History of the Jewish Wars, b. ii. have informed us.—Whitby's Annotations.

^g It was a received custom among the Jews, for every man, of what rank or quality soever, to learn some handicraft; for one of their proverbial expressions is, that 'whoever teaches not his son a trade, teaches him to be a thief.' and in those hot countries, where tents, which were commonly made of skins, or leather, sewed together, to keep out the violence of the weather, were used, not only by soldiers, but by travellers, and others, whose business required them to be abroad, a tent-maker was no mean or unprofitable employ.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, and Pool's Annotations.

A. M. 4056. A. D. 52; OR, A. M. 5463. A. D. 52, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

clarity to the believers of Macedonia, and gives them many instructions concerning a good life and conversation; wherein he exhorts them to the practice of all purity and holiness, especially in the use of the marriage-bed; to avoid idleness; to be diligent in their callings, and not immoderate in their grief for the dead; and wherein he instructs them in the doctrine of the resurrection, the manner of Christ's coming to judgment, and the obligation all were under to make a timely preparation for it.

Upon the accession of Timothy and Silas, St Paul preached the doctrine of Christ with fresh ardour to the Jews; but when he perceived, that instead of attending to it, they only opposed it with blasphemous and opprobrious language, he openly declared his rejection of them, and purpose of applying himself to the Gentiles.^a However, before he did this, some persons of distinction among them, such as Crispus,^b the chief ruler of the synagogue, and Stephanus and Gaius, together with their whole families, had embraced the doctrine of the gospel, and were baptized into the Christian faith. Among the Gentiles he made a multitude of converts; and, by a vision from heaven, being encouraged to proceed in his ministry with boldness, under the divine protection, and in certain hopes of success, he there continued for the space of one whole year and six months.

During his stay in this place, the Jews made a general insurrection against him, and brought him before Gallio,^c who at that time was proconsul of Achaia, accusing him of attempting to introduce a new religion, contrary to what was established by the Jewish law, and permitted by the Roman powers. But as Gallio apprehended that this was a controversy, which fell not under the cognisance of the civil judicature, he would have no concern in it, and therefore ordered his officers to drive them out of the court. Whereupon the common people took Sosthenes,^d a ruler of the synagogue, and one of St Paul's chief accusers, and beat him publicly be^a His words are, 'from henceforth I will turn to the Gentiles,' (Acts xviii. 6.) and these at first sight seem to be a declaration, that he would leave off preaching to the Jews, wherever he came, and wholly apply himself to the conversion of the Gentiles; but by comparing his actions with the places where this phrase, or something like it, does occur, it appears, that he only intended to say, he would no longer preach to the Jews of that place; for after this is said, we find him still entering into the synagogues, and preaching to the Jews, and calling upon them to hear the word, (Acts xv. 8. and xxviii. 23, &c.)—W'hilly's Annotations.

^b Crispus is said to have been made by St Paul bishop of Aegina, an island near Athens; and Origen makes mention of one Gaius, a disciple of St Paul, who by him was appointed bishop of Thessalonica; but of Stephanus we have no other account than what we learn from the Acts of the Apostles.—Calnel's Dictionary.

^c The name of this proconsul was once Marcus Annæus Novatus, but being adopted by Lucius Junius Gallio, he took the name of his adoptive father, and was brother to the famous Seneca, tutor to Nero. To him it is that that philosopher dedicates his book De vita beata; and of him the Roman historians give us the character, that he was a man of sweet temper and disposition, an enemy to all vice, and particularly a hater of flattery. He was twice made proconsul of Achaia; first by Claudius, and afterwards by Nero; but as he partook of his brother's prosperity when he was in favour at court, so was he a sharer in his misfortunes when he fell under Nero's displeasure, and at length was put to death by the tyrant, as well as his brother.—Calnel's Commentary, Poole's and Beausobre's Annotations.

^d Crispus, we read, was ruler of the synagogue at Corinth; and therefore we may suppose, either that there were more synagogues in that city than one, or that there might be several rulers in one and the same synagogue; or that Crispus, after his conversion to Christianity, might be succeeded in that office by Sosthenes; but then we are at a loss to know who the people were that thus beat and misused him. The Greek printed copies tell us, that they were the Gentiles; and those who read the text thus, imagine, that when they perceived the neglect and disregard wherewith the proconsul received the Jews, they, to insult them the more, fell foul upon the ruler of their synagogue, who was at their head; whether out of hatred to them, or friendship to St Paul, it makes no matter. But others think, Sosthenes, however head of the synagogue, might be a secret friend and disciple of St Paul, and that the other Jews, seeing themselves neglected by Gallio, might vent their malice upon him; for they suppose that this was the same Sosthenes, whose name St Paul, in the beginning of his first epistle to the Corinthians, written about three years after this scuffle happened at Corinth, joins with his own. It must be owned, however, that this opinion was not universally received, since, in the time of Eusebius, it was thought that the Sosthenes mentioned in the epistle, was one of the LXX disciples; and consequently, could not be the chief of the synagogue of Corinth twenty years after the death of Jesus Christ.—Beausobre's Annotations, Calnel's Commentary and Dictionary.

conversion to Christianity, might be succeeded in that office by Sosthenes; but then we are at a loss to know who the people were that thus beat and misused him. The Greek printed copies tell us, that they were the Gentiles; and those who read the text thus, imagine, that when they perceived the neglect and disregard wherewith the proconsul received the Jews, they, to insult them the more, fell foul upon the ruler of their synagogue, who was at their head; whether out of hatred to them, or friendship to St Paul, it makes no matter. But others think, Sosthenes, however head of the synagogue, might be a secret friend and disciple of St Paul, and that the other Jews, seeing themselves neglected by Gallio, might vent their malice upon him; for they suppose that this was the same Sosthenes, whose name St Paul, in the beginning of his first epistle to the Corinthians, written about three years after this scuffle happened at Corinth, joins with his own. It must be owned, however, that this opinion was not universally received, since, in the time of Eusebius, it was thought that the Sosthenes mentioned in the epistle, was one of the LXX disciples; and consequently, could not be the chief of the synagogue of Corinth twenty years after the death of Jesus Christ.—Beausobre's Annotations, Calnel's Commentary and Dictionary.

^e Ephesus, the metropolis and principal mart of the proconsular Asia, is situated upon the river Cayster, and on the side of a hill, which, towards the west, has the prospect of a lovely plain, watered and beautified with the pleasant circles of the river, turning and winding in so many curious mazes, that some travellers have mistaken it for the Meander; and this the rather, because the Turks gave it the name of the Lesser Mendres. Among heathen authors this city was once much celebrated for its famous temple of Diana, which, for its largeness and workmanship, was accounted one of the seven wonders of the world. It is said to have been 425 feet long, 220 broad, and to have been supported with 127 pillars of marble, 70 feet high, whereof 27 were most curiously wrought and all the rest polished. One Ctesiphon, a famous architect in his time, contrived the model of it; and that with so much art and curiosity, that it took up two hundred years before it was finished, even though it was built at the common charge of all Asia, properly so called. After it was finished, it was seven times set on fire; but once more especially, on the very same day that Socrates was poisoned, 400 years before Christ; and, at another time, when Erostratus fired it only to get himself a name, on the same night that Alexander the Great was born. It was rebuilt, however, and beautified by the Ephesians, to which work the ladies of Ephesus contributed very largely. In the time of our apostle, it retained conversion to Christianity, might be succeeded in that office by Sosthenes; but then we are at a loss to know who the people were that thus beat and misused him. The Greek printed copies tell us, that they were the Gentiles; and those who read the text thus, imagine, that when they perceived the neglect and disregard wherewith the proconsul received the Jews, they, to insult them the more, fell foul upon the ruler of their synagogue, who was at their head; whether out of hatred to them, or friendship to St Paul, it makes no matter. But others think, Sosthenes, however head of the synagogue, might be a secret friend and disciple of St Paul, and that the other Jews, seeing themselves neglected by Gallio, might vent their malice upon him; for they suppose that this was the same Sosthenes, whose name St Paul, in the beginning of his first epistle to the Corinthians, written about three years after this scuffle happened at Corinth, joins with his own. It must be owned, however, that this opinion was not universally received, since, in the time of Eusebius, it was thought that the Sosthenes mentioned in the epistle, was one of the LXX disciples; and consequently, could not be the chief of the synagogue of Corinth twenty years after the death of Jesus Christ.—Beausobre's Annotations, Calnel's Commentary and Dictionary.

2 Thess. passim.

^e Ephesus, the metropolis and principal mart of the proconsular Asia, is situated upon the river Cayster, and on the side of a hill, which, towards the west, has the prospect of a lovely plain, watered and beautified with the pleasant circles of the river, turning and winding in so many curious mazes, that some travellers have mistaken it for the Meander; and this the rather, because the Turks gave it the name of the Lesser Mendres. Among heathen authors this city was once much celebrated for its famous temple of Diana, which, for its largeness and workmanship, was accounted one of the seven wonders of the world. It is said to have been 425 feet long, 220 broad, and to have been supported with 127 pillars of marble, 70 feet high, whereof 27 were most curiously wrought and all the rest polished. One Ctesiphon, a famous architect in his time, contrived the model of it; and that with so much art and curiosity, that it took up two hundred years before it was finished, even though it was built at the common charge of all Asia, properly so called. After it was finished, it was seven times set on fire; but once more especially, on the very same day that Socrates was poisoned, 400 years before Christ; and, at another time, when Erostratus fired it only to get himself a name, on the same night that Alexander the Great was born. It was rebuilt, however, and beautified by the Ephesians, to which work the ladies of Ephesus contributed very largely. In the time of our apostle, it retained at Jerusalem at the passover, he could not be persuaded to stay longer. Leaving therefore Aquila and Priscilla at Ephesus, and promising, if God would permit, to return to them again, he set sail for Cesarea in Palestine, and from thence proceeded to Jerusalem. After he had visited the church, and kept the feast, he went down to Antioch; and having there staid sometime, he traversed the countries of Galatia and Phrygia, confirming, as he went along, the new converted Christians, and returned to Ephesus.

A. M. 4058. A. D. 54; OR, A. M. 5465. A. D. 54. &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

In his absence, Apollos, a Jew of Alexandria, eminent for his eloquence, and great knowledge of the Old Testament, came to Ephesus, and though he was only initiated by the baptism of John, ^a yet being by Aquila a great deal of its former grandeur; but, at present, it is only an heap of ruins, and the very place where it once stood, is so little known, that it affords matter of various conjecture to travellers. The only two buildings worth observation, are a strong and lofty castle, situated on an eminence, and a beautiful church, honoured with the name of St John, but now converted into a Turkish mosque. All the rest of the place is the habitation of herdsmen and farmers, who live in low and humble cottages of dirt, covered on the top with earth, and sheltered from the extremity of the weather by mighty masses of ruinous walls, the pride and ostentation of former days, and in these the emblem of the frailty of the world, and the transient vanity of human glory.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.—Ephesus is now under the dominion of the Turks, and is in a state of almost total ruin. The plough has passed over the city; and in March, 1826, when visited by the Rev. Messrs Hartley and Arundell, green corn was growing, in all directions, amidst the forsaken ruins; and one solitary individual only was found who bore the name of Christ, instead of its once flourishing church. Where once assembled thousands exclaimed 'great is Diana of the Ephesians,' now the eagle yells and the jackall moans.—Horne's Introd.—Ed.

^a The account which St Paul gives us of the baptism of John, our Saviour's forerunner, is this,—'John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying to the people, that they should believe on him who should come after him,' that is, 'on Jesus Christ,' (Acts xix. 4.) And herein he discovers a wide difference between the baptism of John and that of Jesus Christ, namely, that the baptism of John was a solemn rite of renouncing sins, and profession of obedience for the future; that it opened a way for a more perfect institution of the like nature, and exhibited Christ as the object of faith, and the master and guide which men ought to follow. For, being thus baptized, they were thereby led and consigned over to him, and qualified for the Christian baptism, which vastly exceeds the other both in dignity and efficacy. For here the Spirit accompanies the water; this confirms and completes that pardon of sins, and those assistances of grace, which belonged to no other washings, farther than as they were approaches to the Christian; which is therefore, by way of distinction and eminence styled, 'the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost,' (Tit. iii. 5.) But if the baptism of John was so imperfect, how came it to pass, that, even twenty years after our Lord's ascension, this Apollos should have no knowledge of any other? or, being so well acquainted with the doctrine of Christ, to be able to teach others, how could he be ignorant of the necessity of his baptism? Now the only reply to this is, that Apollos might be one of those Jews, who, having received the baptism of John some two or three and twenty years before, might, soon after that, or before the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost on the apostles at the day of Pentecost, remove from Judea to Alexandria, where, having not yet seen any of the gospel-histories that might possibly be published at this time, nor had an opportunity of conversing with any of the apostles, to gain farther information, he acquiesced in the baptism he had received, until he came to understand better;—unless we suppose, with St Chrysostom, (Hom. 40.) that God vouchsafed him, as he did Cornelius, the baptism of the Spirit, which supplied the want of external baptism, both as an encouragement and recompence for his zeal in preaching the gospel. What became of this great preacher, after his return and Priscilla more fully instructed in the rudiments of the Christian religion, and baptized, he taught the word of God with great boldness, and a most powerful zeal. After some stay in Ephesus, he obtained commendatory letters ^b from the brethren, and with them went over to Coriuth, where he proved highly serviceable, and ¹ watered what St Paul had before planted, confirming the disciples, and convincing the Jews, that Jesus was the true and only Messiah promised in the holy Scriptures.

At St Paul's return to Ephesus, he found several disciples, as well as Apollos, who had received no more than the baptism of John, and had never once heard of the gifts of the Holy Ghost: however, when they were sufficiently instructed in the principles of Christianity, and solemnly admitted to Christian baptism, upon the imposition of the apostle's hands, they immediately received the Holy Ghost, in the gift of tongues, prophecy, and other miraculous powers that were conferred on them. For three months after this, St Paul went into the synagogues, and preached to the Jews, endeavouring, with much earnestness, to convince them, that Jesus Christ was the true Messiah, but when, instead of success, he met with nothing but refractoriness and infidelity, he left the synagogues, and, for the space of two years, instructed the heathen converts, as well as all others who resorted to him, in the school of one Tyrannus. ^c By this means all the inhabitants of the Proconsular Asia had an opportunity of having the gospel preached to them, and of seeing it confirmed by miracles of an extraordinary nature, which St Paul was enabled to do; inasmuch that if napkins, or handkerchiefs, were but touched by him, and applied to those who were anywise sick, or possessed with devils, they immediately received cure.

Seven brothers, the sons of one Sceva, a Jewish priest, who travelled from town to town to cure diseases, and cast out devils by their exorcisms, ^d observing with what from Corinth to Ephesus, we have no manner of account, unless we may credit what St Jerom tells us of him, namely, that being dissatisfied with the division which his preaching at Corinth had occasioned, (1 Cor. iii. 7.) he retired into Crete, with Zena, a doctor of the law; but that after St Paul, by his letter, had appeared that dissension, he returned again to Corinth, and was made bishop of that city.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, and Cabnet's Commentary.

¹ 1 Cor. iii. 6.

^b That commendatory epistles, certifying the piety and orthodoxy of the person to whom they were given, and recommending him to an hospitable reception in the places which he travelled to, were an ancient custom in the primitive church, is evident from the testimony of several fathers, and other ecclesiastical writers; but whether they took their rise from tesseræ hospitalitatis among the heathens, or from the Jews, among whom the same custom prevailed, is a point wherein the learned are not agreed.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^c Among the Jews there were two kinds of schools wherein the law was taught, private and public. Their private schools were those wherein a doctor of the law entertained his scholars, and were usually styled 'houses of learning.' Their public schools were those where their consistories sat to resolve all difficulties and differences of the law; but it seems most likely that the Tyrannus who lent St Paul his school to preach in, was not a Jew, but a Gentile; not a doctor of the law, but some philosopher, or public professor of rhetoric, whom the apostle had converted; because, when he departed from the Jews, and separated the disciples, (Acts xix. 9.) it is reasonable to think, that the place made use of for their instruction, should appertain to a Gentile rather than a Jew.—Howell's Annotations.

^d The word comes from the Greek ἰζορκίζω, which signifies facility St Paul effected his miraculous cures and dispossessions, attempted themselves to do the like, and, to add greater force to their charms, presumed to change their form ^a by invoking the name of Jesus over a demoniac. But here it pleased God to put a visible difference between those that applied this powerful name regularly, and with commission, and others, who, of their own heads, and for ill designs, dared to usurp it: for the demoniac, falling upon the exorcists, tore off their clothes, wounded their bodies, and scarce suffered them to escape with their lives. This was an event, which, when the Jews and Gentiles in Ephesus came to know it, filled them with such a reverential fear, that none dared to mention the name of Jesus but with a profound respect; and that many who had addicted themselves to the study of magic, ^b came, and confessed their sins, and publicly burnt their books, which amounted to the value of above fifteen hundred pounds of our money. ^c So prevalent was the gospel of God in these parts.

A. M. 4058. A. D. 54; OR, A. M. 5465. A. D. 54, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

While St Paul was thus diligently pursuing his mini-to adjure, or use the name of God, with a design to drive devils out of places and bodies which they possess. And that the Jews had several incantations in use and veneration, which they had in greater credit, because of an opinion common among them, that they had been invented by Solomon, is evident from the testimony of Josephus. That even in our Saviour's time, exorcists were very frequent among them, is manifest from these words of his, 'If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your children cast them out? Therefore they shall be your judges,' (Mat. xii. 27.) And that they practised their exorcisms sometimes with success, is plain from the acknowledgment of Ireneus, who says, 'all things are subject to the most High, and by invocation of his name, even before the advent of our Lord, men were saved from evil spirits, and all kinds of demons.'—Calmet's Dictionary, and Commentary on Acts xix. 13; and Whitby and Grotius on Mat. xii. 27.

^a Their common form of incantation was, 'in the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.'

^b The word used here (τελετουργία) denotes properly those things that require care, or skill; and was thus applied to the arts of magic, and jugglery, and sleight of hand, that were practised so extensively in eastern countries. That such arts were practised at Ephesus is well known. The Ephesian letters, by which incantations and charms were supposed to be produced, were much celebrated. They seem to have consisted of certain combinations of letters or words, which, by being pronounced with certain intonations of voice, were believed to be effectual in expelling diseases, or evil spirits; or which, by being written on parchment and worn, were supposed to operate as amulets, or charms, to guard from evil spirits, or from danger. Thus Plutarch (Sympos. 7) says, 'the magicians compel those who are possessed with a demon to recite and pronounce the Ephesian letters, in a certain order, by themselves.' Thus Clemens Alex. (Strom. ii.) says, 'Androcydes, a Pythagorean, says, that the letters which are called Ephesian, and which are so celebrated, are symbols,' &c. Erasmus says, (Adagg. Cent. 2), that there were certain marks and magical words among the Ephesians, by which they succeeded in every undertaking. Eusath. ad Homer Odys. says, 'that those letters were incantations which Cræsus used when on the funeral pile, and which greatly befriended him.' He adds, that in the war between the Milesians and Ephesians, the latter were thirteen times saved from ruin by the use of these letters. See Grotius and Kuinoel in loco.—Barnes on the Acts.—ED.

^c If the 50,000 pieces of silver mentioned in the text be taken for Jewish shekels, and valued at three shillings each, (which are the principles of Dr Benson's computation, Hist. vol. II. p. 149.) the sum will amount to £7500 sterling, or, setting it at half-a-crown, to £6250. But as the Attic drachm seems to have been more frequently used among the Greeks, than any coin equal to the Jewish shekel, I think it more natural to compute by that, which, if with Dr Prideaux we reckon it at 9d. reduces the sum to £1875.—Doddridge's Erpisor.—ED.

stry, St Peter was preaching the gospel to the Jews in several provinces of the Lesser Asia; and so travelling eastward came at length to the ancient city of Babylon ^d in Chaldea, from whence he wrote his first epistle, which is called a catholic or general epistle, to the converted Jews that were of the dispersion; and, 'after solemn thanksgiving to God for their call to Christianity, whereby they had obtained a lively hope of an eternal inheritance in heaven, he advises them to the practice of several virtues, as a means to make their calling and election sure; namely, that they should live in a constant worship and fear of God, and imitate their master Jesus Christ in holiness and purity; that they should be diligent hearers of the gospel, and grow up to perfection by it; that they should lead exemplary lives among the Gentiles, abstaining from carnal lusts, and behaving themselves with modesty, thereby to convince their enemies that their calumnies were unreasonable; that they should behave themselves well under their respective relations, submitting themselves to their governors, whether supreme or subordinate; that servants should obey their masters, wives be subject to their husbands, and husbands honour their wives; that they should all love one another fervently and unfeignedly, bear afflictions patiently, live in union, and sympathise with each other in their afflictions; and, lastly, that the ministers and pastors of the several churches should take special care of the flocks committed to their charge, teach them diligently, and govern them gently, not seeking their own gain and profit, but the salvation of the people's souls.' This is the purport of the epistle, and the whole is written with a fervour and zeal not unbecoming so great an apostle. But to proceed with St Paul.

After a stay of about two years in Ephesus, he determined to return into Macedonia and Achaia, and having wintered in Corinth, to pass thence to Jerusalem, where he purposed to celebrate the feast of Pentecost, and after that to proceed in his long intended journey to Rome. In pursuance of this design, he sent Timothy and Erastus ^e before him into Macedonia, but himself

^d Those who take Babylon in a mystical sense, understand by it Rome, from whence they suppose that St Peter wrote this epistle, not long after his coming thither; and for the confirmation of this, they tell us, that St John, in his book of Revelations, calls Rome by the name of Babylon, either from its conformity in power and greatness to that ancient city, or from its resemblance of it in idolatry, and oppression of God's people. Others, who still take it in a figurative sense, by Babylon had rather understand Jerusalem, no longer now the holy city, say they, but a kind of spiritual Babylon, in which the church of God did at this time groan under great servitude and captivity: and to support this notion of the word, they produce the authority of some fathers who understood that of the prophet, 'We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed,' in this sense, (Jer. li. 9.) But, as a mystical and figurative sense does not so well agree with the date of a letter, and to conceal the place from whence they wrote, was never the practice of any of the apostles, it is more natural to understand it of Babylon, properly so called, though whether it was Babylon in Egypt, where St Peter might preach the gospel, or Babylon, the ancient metropolis of Assyria, where, ever since the time of their captivity, great numbers of Jews were settled, we leave the inquisitive reader to determine.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles, and Beausobre's Preface on 1 Epist. of Pet.—See a note on this subject in Bloomfield's Greek Testament, 1 Peter v. 13, in which the evidence adduced seems greatly in favour of its being the ancient Babylon in Chaldea.—ED.

^e Erastus, was very probably born at Corinth, and, as the apostle informs us, was made chamberlain of that city, (Rom xvi. 23.) but being converted by St Paul, and resolving to pur stayed behind at Ephesus, very probably to answer a letter which Apollos, and some other brethren, had brought him from the church of Corinth, desiring his resolution of several points relating to marriage, and chastity, and some other subjects. The Corinthians were, at this time, unhappily divided into parties and factions on account of their teachers, each one preferring the person from whom he had received his instruction, and disparaging the rest. They committed great disorders in their love-feasts,^a and celebrated the holy sacrament very irreverently. They were addicted to fornication; and one in particular, had run into incest, in marrying his father's wife. They were unjust and fraudulent in their dealings; they went to law, at heathen tribunals; and among them were found some who were bold and profligate enough to deny the resurrection. In opposition to all this, the apostle, in what is called his ^b 'first epistle to the Corinthians,' shows the equality of Christ's ministers, and their insufficiency for the work to which they are ordained, without the divine assistance; orders the incestuous person to be excommunicated, lest his example should infect others; blames their litigious law suits, as thinking it much better to refer their differences to some of their own body; propounds the first institution of the sacrament, and a previous examination of their lives, to bring them to a right use of it; answers their questions relating to marriage, celibacy, and meats offered to idols; and having added several things, concerning a decent behaviour, both of men and women, in their churches; concerning the gifts of the Holy Ghost, sue his fortune, he resigned his employment, followed him all along, until his last voyage to Corinth, in the way to Rome, where the apostle suffered martyrdom. The Latin writers say, that St Paul left Erastus in Macedonia; that he made him bishop of that province, and that he died a martyr at Philippi; but the Greeks, in their calendars, make him bishop of Panceas, near the sources of the river Jordan, give him the title of an apostle, place him in the number of the seventy disciples, and say, that he died in peace, after having gone over all the earth, preaching the faith of Jesus Christ: but not any of these produce one proof of what they say.—Calnet's Commentary.

A. M. 4061. A. D. 57; OR, A. M. 5498. A. D. 57, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

^a These feasts of charity, which were in use among the primitive Christians in memory of the last supper, which our blessed Saviour had with his apostles when he instituted the holy eucharist, were kept in the church towards the evening after the common prayers were over, and the word of salvation had been heard. When this was done, the whole congregation eat together what every one had brought with him, in great simplicity and union, so that there was no distinction between rich and poor; and after a frugal and modest supper, they partook of the sacrament, and gave each other a kiss of peace, and so departed. But this custom, as good and laudable as it was in its original, came in a short time to be abused.—Calnet's Dictionary under the word Agape.

^b That this was an epistle written by St Paul the apostle, as is asserted in the first verse, was never once doubted in the church of God; but whether it was his first epistle to the Corinthians, has been a matter of dispute; because he says in it, 'I have written to you an epistle,' (chap. v. 9) which seems plainly to relate to a former epistle. But as none of the ancients ever ascribed to St Paul more than fourteen epistles, even including that to the Hebrews, no Christian writer ever cited any thing from an epistle of his to the Corinthians, supposed to be lost; and all the Greek scholiasts declare, that the apostle in these words speaketh not of another, but of this very epistle; the words ἡ γράμμα ἡ ἐπιστολή, which we translate, 'I wrote,' should rather be rendered, 'I had wrote,' (it being a common observation of grammarians, that the Aorist is so called, because it is of an indefinite signification, sometimes used for the perfect, and sometimes for the plusquam-perfect tense, 'I had wrote,') but made some alteration in my letter before I sent it.—W hitby's Preface to the first epistle to the Corinthians.

the excellency of charity, the gift of tongues, and prayer in an unknown language; he proves the truth of the gospel, and the certainty of a future resurrection, almost to a demonstration.⁷

About the same time it was that St Paul, in like manner, wrote his epistle to the Galatians. ^c For being informed, that since his departure several impostors had crept in among them, who strongly insisted on the necessity of circumcision, and other legal rites, and greatly disparaged his authority, as being but a second-hand apostle, in comparison of Peter, James, and John, from whom they pretended to derive their instructions; in this epistle, 'he reproves them with some necessary warmth and severity, for suffering themselves so easily to be imposed upon by crafty artifices of seducers. He largely refutes those Judaical opinions wherewith they were infected, and by several arguments proves, that the slavery of the law brought a curse with it, was destructive of their Christian liberty, and incapable of procuring their justification in the sight of God. Among these reproofs and arguments, however, he mingles several exhortations full of paternal and apostolic charity; and towards the conclusion, gives them many excellent rules and directions for the conduct of their lives and conversations.'

A little before St Paul's departure from Ephesus, one Demetrius, a silver-smith, who dealt in making little models ^d of the temple of Ephesus, with the image of Diana included in them, perceiving, that if the Christian

^c There is great diversity of opinion among learned men concerning the date of the epistle to the Galatians. Weingart supposes it to have been written so early as the year 48; Michaelis in 49; Cappel, in 51; Bishop Pearson, in 57; Mill, Fabricius, Moldenhawer, and others, in 58; Van Til and Dr Doddridge, in 53; Hottinger, in 54; Lord Barrington, Drs Benson and Lardner, in 53; Beausobre, Rosenmuller, and Dr A. Clarke, in 52 or 53; Bishop Tomline, in 52. Theodoret, who is followed by Dr Lightfoot and some others, imagine that it was one of those epistles which St Paul wrote from Rome during his first confinement; but this opinion is contradicted by the apostle's silence concerning his bonds, which he has often mentioned in the letters that are known to have been written at that time. It is evident that the epistle to the Galatians was written early, because he complains in it of their speedy apostasy from his doctrine (Gal. i. 6.) and warns them in the strongest and most forcible terms against the Judaizing teachers, who disturbed the peace of the churches in Syria and Asia Minor. (i. 7—9. iii. 1.) The warmth of the apostle's expressions led Tertullian to conclude that St Paul was himself a neophyte or novice in the Christian faith at the time of writing this epistle. And as no intimation is given through the whole of it that he had been with them more than once, we are authorized to conclude, that he wrote this letter from Corinth about the end of 52, or early in the year 53. The subscription, indeed, states it to have been written from Rome: but this is evidently spurious, for St Paul's first journey to Rome did not take place until at least ten years after the conversion of the Galatians.—Horne's Introduction.—Ed.

^d In the idolatry of the heathens, they used to carry the images of their gods in procession from one city to another, which they did in a chariot consecrated for that purpose. But besides this greater, there was a less frame, wherein it was placed, by the Romans, called fericulum, not much unlike that which the Greeks called ναός, 'a little chapel,' representing the form of a temple, with an image in it, which being set upon the altar, or other solemn place, and the leaves of the door opened, the image appeared, sitting or standing in state, and so was represented to the spectators. The making of these temples and images in miniature, was certainly a very profitable employment at Ephesus, because few people of distinction came to visit this great wonder of the world, who did not carry home with them some of these little models of it, not only as an evidence of the pilgrimage they had performed, but as a means likewise to incite their devotion to the religion prevailed, this gainful employment of his would be totally ruined, called together a great number of the same profession, and, having represented to them the injury which St Paul, by his preaching every where against idolatry, was like to do, not only to the trade, whereby they subsisted, but to the honour and reputation likewise of the great goddess Diana, ^a whom all the world adored, he so inflamed them with his speech, that immediately they cried out, 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians!' And as the spirit of mutiny soon spread from the workmen to the rabble, it was not long before the whole city was in an uproar.

A. M. 4061. A. D. 57; OR, A. M. 5468. A. D. 57, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

In this confusion, the people, seizing upon Gaius and Aristarchus, ^b two of St Paul's companions, hurried them to the theatre, with a design, very probably, to throw them to the wild beasts, as their custom was to treat malefactors; ^c which when Paul understood, he would have ventured himself among them, had not the Christians then present, and even some of the prefects of the theatrical games, ^d well knowing what danger this would have exposed him to, earnestly dissuaded him from it: and to this, without doubt, he alludes, when elsewhere he tells us, that ¹ he fought with beasts at Ephesus. ^e goddess Diana.—Hammond's, Beausobre's and Poole's Annotations.

¹ 1 Cor. xv. 32.

^a The heathens, who had their superior and inferior gods and goddesses, always placed Diana in the number of the former, which are all included in the two verses of Ennius:

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovi, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo.

These were worshipped by the Gentiles of all nations; but the inferior kind, who were called Dii minorum gentium, were only known and worshipped in some particular countries and places.—Calmet's Commentary.

^b He was a Macedonian, and native of Thessalonica, who adjoining himself to St Paul, accompanied him to Ephesus, and there continued with him for the two years of his abode, partaking in all the labours and dangers of the apostleship. From Ephesus he followed him into Greece; from Greece into Asia; from Asia into Judea; and from Judea into Rome; where, as some say, he was belated with him in Nero's reign.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c It does not appear that such was their immediate design. The theatres of the Greeks were not only places for public exhibitions, but also for holding assemblies, and often for courts, elections, &c. The people, therefore, naturally rushed there, as being a suitable place to decide this matter.—Barnes.—ED.

^d Among the heathens there were games instituted in honour of the good deities, even as sacrifices and victims were to appease the bad and angry. Of these games, at Rome, the pontifices, or high-priests, were presidents, and, in other places, the priests and chief magistrates, who, from their provinces, were called 'Asiarchæ, Syriarchæ, Bithyniarchæ,' &c. They were generally chosen out of the chief cities, and best families in the province, and had the regulation not only of what concerned the worship of their gods, but of several other public affairs, particularly of the games and combats which were exhibited to the people in their theatres. Thus in the martyrdom of Polycarp at Smyrna, the people asked Philip, the ruler of the games there, to let out a lion upon the aged bishop; which he refused to do, because, as he tells them, the games were ended; from whence it appears, that it belonged to the Asiarchæ, here mentioned, to let loose the wild beasts upon the malefactors; and therefore, having some kindness for St Paul—a great work of God's providence that they had—they sent him word to keep close, and not venture himself upon the theatre, knowing that the full purpose of the people was to set him to the ἄγριονμαχίας, or 'combating with wild beasts,' if he did.—Whitby's, Beausobre's and Hammond's Annotations. It is more probable, however, that the danger which Paul would have incurred by going into the theatre, was that of being torn in pieces by an infuriated multitude.—ED.

^e That St Paul, in this place, does actually refer us to what

The tumult, in the mean time, increased rather than diminished; when a certain Jew, named Alexander, ^f breaking through the crowd, and making a sign with his hand for silence, would have made a speech to the people, with a design, very probably, to excuse the Jews, and throw the odium upon the Christians; but they perceiving him to be a Jew, and thereby suspecting him to be one of Paul's associates, began to raise an outcry for near two hours together, wherein nothing was heard, but 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians!' When the noise was a little abated, however, the recorder of the city came out, and calmly told them, that it was sufficiently known to all the world, what a mighty veneration the city of Ephesus had for their great goddess Diana, and the famous image, ^g which fell down from heaven; so that there needed not any disturbance to vindicate and assert it, that they had seized on persons who were not guilty either of sacrilege, or blasphemy against their goddess; that if Demetrius and his company had any just charge against them, the courts were sitting, and they might besell him at Ephesus, is manifest from his own words in another epistle to the Corinthians, where he mentions his great persecution in Asia, whereof Ephesus was the metropolis, and a 'pressure so heavy, that he despaired even of life, having the sentence of death in himself; but that, trusting in God, who raised the dead, he was delivered from so great a death,' (2 Cor. i. 8, &c.) But then the question is, whether these beasts at Ephesus are to be taken in a literal or metaphorical sense? That cruel and bloody-minded men are often represented under the metaphor of beasts, cannot be denied; and that St Paul was actually exposed to beasts, but they would not touch him, those (says Nicphorus, Hist. Eccl. b. ii. c. 25.) who wrote the life of this apostle do affirm. Either of these senses therefore may be true; but as we read no where in the Acts, or in the catalogue of his afflictions, (2 Cor. xi.) that St Paul did really fight with wild beasts, our best way is to render the preceding words κατ' ἄβυσσους, not according to the manner, but according to the intention of men, and then the sense will be, that according to the intention of the men of Ephesus, he had fought with beasts, because, in the tumult which Demetrius had raised, the people's design was to have dealt so with St Paul's companions, and much more so with him, had not his friends dissuaded him from entering into the theatre.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^f Who this Alexander was, whether a Jew, or a Jewish convert, and whether for or against St Paul, it no where appears from the sacred history; and therefore some have imagined, that this was the Alexander who afterwards revolted from the Christian faith, of whom St Paul complains so loudly, (1 Tim. i. 20. 2 Tim. iv. 14.) but that now being a friend and retainer to the apostle, he was about to stand up in his defence, and make his apology. We can scarce think, however, that had the thing been thus, the Jews would have encouraged or put him forward, (Acts xix. 33.) and therefore the more probable conjecture is, that he was a Jew, who, perceiving his countrymen involved in this affair, at their solicitation, was for addressing himself to the multitude, in order to excuse them, and to lay all the blame of the tumult upon the Christians.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^g The image of this Diana was not set out in an hunting dress, with a bow and arrows in her hand, and a crescent upon her head, but it was covered with breasts, sometimes from head to foot, and sometimes her bosom only and belly were covered with them; and all besides was a kind of pedestal, adorned at proper distances with the heads of stags and dogs, having about half their bodies prominent. The multitude of her breasts denoted her fertility, as being called 'the nurse of all living creatures;' and the dogs and stags which belonged to her were the indication of her being the goddess of hunting. This image, singular as it was, is said to have been the work of one Canetius, whose name is still upon record; but as it had subsisted long beyond the memory of man, the crafty priests persuaded the credulous multitude that it fell from heaven, that thereby they might advance both its honour and their own profit.—Calmet's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

A. M. 4061. A. D. 57; OR, A. M. 5498. A. D. 57, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

enter their accusation; or, if the controversy was about any other matter, there were proper judicatures to determine it in; that therefore they should do well to be pacified, having done more already than they could answer, and being in danger of incurring a severe punishment if they should be called to an account, as very likely they might, for that day's riotous assembly. And with this prudent discourse he appeased and dispersed the multitude.

As soon as this storm was dispersed, St Paul having called the church together, and constituted Timothy bishop of the place, took his leave and departed by Troas for Macedonia; where, having instructed some, and confirmed others in the principles of a sound faith and holy life, he continued his preaching all over the country, even as far as Illyricum. ^a While he was in Macedonia, Titus came to him, and gave him an account of the good effects which his epistle had at Corinth, and how great reformation it had wrought; but as several vain-glorious teachers still persisted in their contumacy, vilifying his authority, and misrepresenting his words and actions; charging him particularly with levity in not coming according to his promise, with severity in his dealings with the incestuous person, with imperiousness in his writings, abjectness in his person, and some small tincture of irreligion, in overthrowing the Mosaic law, all which he understood from Titus, he thought it necessary to write a second epistle to the Corinthians; wherein he excuses his not coming directly to Corinth, for fear of occasioning their sorrow, and giving himself uneasiness, in being obliged to treat with severity those who had not yet amended their faults; wherein he commends their zeal against the incestuous person, but now, that he had suffered and sorrowed enough for his transgression, allowed them to be reconciled to him; wherein he justifies his conduct, vindicates the dignity and ministry of the gospel, and proves its great excellency above the law; wherein he disclaims those false teachers, who, to estrange them from him, made it their business to traduce and vilify him; and threatens them with his apostolic authority, whenever he came among them, wherein he speaks of himself with some advantage, and though he mentions his supernatural gifts and revelations, yet seems to glory most in his extraordinary labours and sufferings for the gospel; and wherein he exhorts them all to the works of penance and mortification, lest, when he comes, he should be obliged to use his power against offenders; and to have their aims in readiness, that they may not be a hinderance to him at his arrival at Corinth.

^a This is a province of Europe lying to the north or north-west of Macedonia, along the Adriatic sea, now called the gulf of Venice; and its ancient boundaries were, to the east, the upper Mæria and Macedonia; to the west, Istria; and to the north, the two Pannonias; and to the south, the Adriatic sea. It was commonly distinguished into two parts: Lyburnia to the north, where now lies Croatia; and Dalmatia to the south, which still retains its name. St Paul tells us, that 'from Jerusalem, and round about into Illyricum, he had fully preached the gospel of Christ.' (Rom. xv. 19.) So that he must have travelled into Syria, Phœnicia, Arabia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycæonia, Galatia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Phrygia, Troas, Asia, Caria, Lycia, Ionia, Lydia, the isles of Cyprus and Crete, Thracia, Macedonia, Thessalia, and Achaia. So justly, and without ostentation, might he say, that in relation to the other apostles, 'he laboured more abundantly than they all,' 1 Cor. xv. 10.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament, and Cainer's Dictionary.

Having passed over Macedonia, St Paul came into Achaia, ^b and continued there for the space of three months, residing principally at Corinth, from whence he wrote his famous epistle to the Romans: ^c 'wherein he states and determines the great controversy between the Jews and the Gentiles, about the obligation of the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic law, and those main and material doctrines of Christianity which depend on it, such as that of Christian liberty, and the use of indifferent things, &c. wherein he discovers the effects of original sin, and the power it has even in the regenerated; and then explains the profound questions concerning election and reprobation, in his discourse of the calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews; and wherein he intermixes several admirable instructions and exhortations to the duties of an holy and religious life, such as the Christian doctrine does naturally tend to produce.'

From Corinth, St Paul, being to carry the alms which he had gathered in Macedonia and Achaia to the poor Christians in Judea, intended at first to have taken the shortest cut into Syria; but, upon intimation of a conspiracy that the Jews had formed against his life, he altered his course, and determined to go through Macedonia. Accordingly, he and his company set forward, and came to Philippi, where he staid for some time, and there celebrated the feast of the Passover. From Philippi, he went on board, and in five days landed at Troas, where, having tarried a week, on the Lord's day, ^d when the Christians of the place met together to receive the sacrament, he preached to them, and intending to be gone next morning, continued his discourse till midnight; so that a young man, named Eutychus, sitting in a window, and being overtaken with sleep, fell down from the ^b Achaia, in the largest sense, comprehends Greece, properly so called; and so is bounded, on the east, by the Ægean sea; on the west, by Epirus; on the north, by Macedonia; and on the south, by the Peloponnes; but Achaia, strictly so called, is the northern region of the Peloponnes; bounded, on the north, by the gulf of Corinth; on the south, by Arcadia; on the east, by Syria; and on the west, by the Ionian sea.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table.

^c It is a general observation of the ancient commentators, that though this epistle has obtained the first place and rank, it is far from being the first that St Paul wrote; that those to the Thessalonians, Corinthians, and the Galatians, were prior; nay, that it was the very last of all that he composed before his first journey to Rome; and therefore they think that it had the first place assigned it in the canon, either from the majesty of the imperial city to which it was sent, or from the excellency of the doctrine which it contained.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations.

^d The words in the original are, 'Ἐν δὲ τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων, which we render, 'on the first day of the week;' and that this first day of the week was our Lord's day, or the day of our Lord's resurrection from the dead, is obvious from the account of all the evangelists; (see Mat. xxviii. 1. Mark xvi. 9. Luke xxiii. 56. and John xx. 1.) And from hence we may observe, that from the very beginning, Christians used to assemble on the first day of the week, to perform their religious worship; for Pliny, in his epistle to the emperor Trajan, tells him, that 'he found nothing to allege against the Christians, but their obstinacy in their superstition; and that it was their custom to meet together on a set day, before it was light;' (Ep. b. x. ep. 97.) And what that set day was, Justin Martyr, who wrote, not a great many years after Pliny, has taken care to inform us: for, 'on Sunday,' says he, 'all Christians, in the city or country, meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection: and then we have read into us the writings of the prophets and apostles. When this is done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate and do the things which they have heard, and then we all join in prayer; and after that celebrate the sacrament.'—(Apol. ii.)—Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4063. A. D. 58; OR, A. M. 5469. A. D. 58, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

third story, and was taken up dead. But Paul went down, and soon recovered him; and so going up again, he resumed his discourse, and in the celebration of the sacrament, and other divine offices, continued until break of day, and then departed.

From Troas he went on foot to Assos, ^a where, with St Luke, and the rest of the company that were come thither by sea, he embarked, and from thence came to Mitylene; ^b then passing by Chios, ^c he arrived at Samos; ^d and, having stayed a short while at Trogylium, ^e the next day came directly to Miletus, ^f not so much as putting in at Ephesus, because he was resolved, if possible, to be at Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost.

^a This is a sea-port town, situated on the south-west part of the province of Troas, and over against the island Lesbos. By land, it is a great deal nearer Troas than it is by sea, because of a promontory that runs a great way into the ocean, and must be doubled before we can come to Assos, which was the reason the apostle chose rather to walk it.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament, and Calmet's Commentary.—There is notice of a Christian church existing here in the eighth century, and John bishop of Assos, is mentioned as one of the Nicean council. The ruins adjoining the modern sea-port are described as numerous and interesting.—Edin. Scripture Gazetteer.—Ed.

^b This was one of the principal cities of the isle of Lesbos, seated in a peninsula, with a commodious haven on each side; and soon became so considerable, as to give name to the whole island, at present called Metelin, many years ago. The island, which is one of the largest in the Archipelago, was in former times renowned for the many eminent persons it had produced; such as Sappho, the inventress of Sapphic verses; Alcaeus a famous lyric poet; Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece; Theophrastus, the noble physician and philosopher; and Arion, the celebrated musician: and the Turks, who have it now in their possession, think it still a place of consequence enough to deserve a fortress and garrison to defend it.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^c This is an island in the Archipelago, next to Lesbos, or Metelene, both in its situation and bigness. It lies over against Smyrna, and is not above four leagues distant from the Asiatic continent. It is celebrated by Horace and Martial, for the wine and figs that came from thence; but at present its renown is, that it produces the most excellent mastic in the world, where the people pay their tribute to the Grand Signior. Nor is it less remarkable for what Sir Paul Ricaut, in his Present State of the Greek Church, tells us of it, namely, That there is no place in the Turkish dominions where Christians enjoy more freedom in their religion and estates, than in this isle, to which they are entitled by an ancient capitulation made with Sultan Mahomet II., which to this day is maintained so faithfully, that no Turk can strike or abuse a Christian, without severe correction.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^d This is another isle in the Archipelago, lying south east of Chios, and about five miles from the Asiatic continent. It is famous among heathen writers, for the worship of Juno; for one of the Sibyls, called Sibylla Samina; for Pherecydes, who foretold an earthquake that happened there, by drinking of the waters; and more especially, for the birth of Pythagoras, who excelled all the seven wise men, so renowned among the Greeks. It was formerly a free commonwealth, and the inhabitants were so powerful, that they managed many prosperous wars against their neighbours: but at present, the Turks have reduced it to such a mean and depopulated condition, that a few pirates dare land and plunder it as they please: so that ever since the year 1676, no Turk has ventured to live upon it, for fear of being carried into captivity by these rovers.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^e It is a cape or promontory, on the Asiatic coast, opposite to Samos, and not much below Ephesus, having a town of the same name.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^f This is a port-town on the continent of Asia Minor, and in the province of Caria, memorable for being the birth-place of Thales, one of the seven wise men in Greece, and father of the Ionic philosophy; of Anaximenes, his scholar; Timotheus, the

From Miletus he sent to Ephesus to assemble the bishops and pastors of the neighbouring churches, and at their arrival, put them in mind—'With what uprightness and integrity, with what affection and humility, and with how great danger and trouble he had been conversant among them, and preached the gospel to them, ever since his coming into those parts: that he had not failed to acquaint them, both publicly and privately, with whatsoever might be profitable to their souls, urging both Jews and Gentiles to repentance and reformation, and an hearty entertainment of the faith of Christ: that now he was determined to go to Jerusalem, where he did not know what particular sufferings would befall him, only that he had been foretold by those who were endued with the prophetic gifts of the Holy Ghost, that in every place afflictions and imprisonment would attend him; but that he was not concerned at this, no, nor unwilling to lay down his life, if so be he might but successfully propagate the gospel, and triumphantly finish his course: that he knew, that from henceforth they should see his face no more; ^g but that this was his particular comfort and satisfaction, that they themselves could bear him witness, that he had not, by concealing any part of the Christian doctrine, betrayed their souls: that, since therefore he was finally to bid them adieu, and the whole care of the church was to devolve upon them, he conjured them to be infinitely careful both of themselves, and of that flock over which the ^h Holy Ghost himself had made them overseers, and for which Christ had paid no less a purchase than his own blood: that all their care, in this respect, would be no more than necessary, because it was certain, that, after his departure, not only heretical teachers ⁱ would break in upon them, and endanger the musician; and Anaximenes the philosopher. At present it is called by the Turks Melas; and not far distant from it is the true Meander, which, though it encircles all the plain it runs through with many wanton mazes, and innumerable windings, yet, in some places, it goes with such a current, as stirs up the earth and gravel from the bottom, which makes its waters not so clear and crystalline as might be expected.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^g If St Paul, as it is generally thought, came again into these parts, the meaning may be, either that it was then his firm persuasion and belief that he should see them no more, or that he should not again see all the presbyters so assembled together. But it is not certain that he ever did see any of them again, even if he visited that part of Asia, as seems probable, from Philem. 22, 25; Phil. i. 25—27. ii. 24.—Holden's Christian Expositor.—Ed.

^h That in these early times of Christianity, the divine Spirit did enable the apostles to discern who were fit to be governors of the church, and that, by its movement or inspiration, they were accordingly chosen to that office, seems to be evident from several passages in scripture. Thus, the Spirit, in the prophets at Antioch, said, 'Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them,' (Acts xiii. 2.) And thus the Holy Ghost is said to have constituted the bishops and presbyters in Asia, (Acts xx. 28.) because, as Clemens Romanus says, 'they made trial of them by the Holy Ghost;' or, as Clemens Alexandrinus has it, 'they were signified to them by the Spirit,' and therefore Ignatius testifies of the bishops of his time, that 'they were not appointed by men, but by the 'counsel of Christ Jesus;' even as St Cyprian says of those in his time, that they were constituted, 'not only by the consent of the people and the suffrages of their fellow bishops, but by the judgment and testimony of God;' and therefore we need not doubt, but that to this kind of election it is that the words of the apostle refer.—Whitby's Annotations.

ⁱ What we termed 'heretical teachers,' St Paul describes by the metaphor of 'grievous wolves, not sparing the flock,' (Acts ruin of men's souls, but that even among themselves, there would arise some, who, by their crafty methods, and unsound doctrines, would make rents and schisms in the church, even as he, with much grief and sorrow of heart, for these three years past, had forewarned them; that, to this purpose, he now recommended them to God's special care and protection, wishing them all the benefits of the gospel, perfection of knowledge, and an heavenly inheritance hereafter; cautioning them against avarice, and making a prey of their flocks; and referring them to his own example, what pains they ought to take to support the weak, and relieve the poor, in remembrance of that excellent saying a of our Saviour, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' b After this farewell sermon, the apostle kneeled down, and concluded all with a solemn prayer: whereupon they all melted into tears, and, with the greatest expressions of sorrow, attended him to the ship; though that which made the deepest impression upon them, was, his having told them that they should see his face no more.

A. M. 4062. A. D. 58; OR A. M. 5469. A. D. 58, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

From Miletus, Paul and his companions came in xx. 29.) and well may they be compared to wolves for their craft and cruelty, their mortal hatred to all good Christians, and lying in wait to circumvent and destroy them. The prophet likens them to evening wolves, (Zeph. iii. 3.) which come secretly in the dark, and are very hungry, zealous, and passionately desirous to pervert harmless and unwary souls; and, lest their malice should be perceived, these ravenous wolves disguise themselves in sheep's clothing, that is, they pretend to great innocence and simplicity, they seem to pity the mistakes and desire the salvation of such as they would insinuate into, and under this veil, they are taken for friends, though still they remain the worst of enemies. — Concler on Ordination.

a None of the evangelists have recorded these words, but St Paul's evidence is sufficient that our Lord actually spoke them. This will give no countenance to the Romish doctrine of tradition, until they can prove that their traditions rest upon apostolical authority; and when they do, Protestants will readily receive them. — Holden's Expositor. — Ed.

b These words are to be expounded according to the measures and limitations of other proverbial sayings in scripture. For though, generally speaking, they are true; yet, in some cases, they will admit of an exception. If he that gives, for instance, does it out of a principle of interest or vain-glory, to get a reputation or strengthen a faction; if he does it to encroach upon the liberty of the obliged, to upbraid him with his necessities, to betray him into any sinful compliance, and make him obnoxious to his humour; it is not to be doubted, but that, in this case, a grateful and benevolent receiver is much a greater man than such a pretended benefactor: but then if we suppose the giver and receiver, purely considered as such, to be both free from every vile principle and moral indisposition, the circumstances of the giver are more desirable than those of the receiver: 1st, because giving includes more perfection in it, and is a more secure and honourable condition. 2dly, because, generally speaking, it is a clearer evidence of a virtuous disposition. 3dly, because charity is a nobler virtue than gratitude, and will be more considered in another world; and, 4thly, because there is more pleasure in giving than receiving. — Collier's Sermons.

c This was an island in the Archipelago, lying near the south-west point of Asia Minor, and having a city of the same name. At present it is commonly called Lango, and was formerly celebrated for the birth of Hippocrates the famous physician, and Apelles the famous painter; for a stately temple dedicated to Apollo, and another to Juno; for the richness of its wines, and the fineness of a stuff made here, which was perfectly transparent. — W'hithy's Alphabetical Table and Wells's Geography of the New Testament. It is now called Stam-Co, (not Lango) and presents to the view fine plantations of lemon trees, intermixed with stately maples. The inhabitants of Cos were a Dorian colony. St Paul merely sailed past this island, and it does not appear that Christianity was professed in it till a considerable period afterwards. The island contains upwards of 8000 inhabitants, of whom about 5000 are stated to have been Turks, and 3000 a straight course to Coos, c the next day to Rhodes, d and thence to Patara, e where, finding a ship that was bound for Phœnicia, they went on board, and arrived safe at Tyre. Here they made a stop for seven days; and St Paul, being advised by some Christians of the place who had the gift of prophecy, not to go up to Jerusalem, would by no means listen to their proposal; f but as they, together with their wives and children, accompanied him to the ship, before he went on board, he embraced them all, and prayed with them on the shore, as he had done before at Miletus. From Tyre they sailed to Ptolemais, g

Greeks, with about fifty Jews. The Greek religion, says Mr Turner (Tour of the Levant, 1815.) is farmed by the bishop of Cos from the Patriarch of Constantinople; he pays 3300 piastres a year for his post, and gains by it from 5000 to 6000. He takes a tenth of the corn of all the island. — Scripture Gazetteer. — Ed.

d Rhodes is an island of the Mediterranean, about eight miles south of Caria in Asia Minor, and 120 in circumference. It is supposed by some to have derived its name from the Rhodian or Dodanim, by whom it is said to have been first peopled, and by others from the abundance of roses which grew upon it. This island was anciently celebrated for the fineness of its climate and of its wines, but chiefly for the Colossus, a brazen statue, seventy cubits high, which stood across the mouth of the harbour of the city of Rhodes, and admitted the largest ships to sail between its legs. It was computed to contain 720,000 pounds weight of brass; and after standing 60 years, was thrown down by an earthquake: in which fallen state it remained above 800 years, when Mauvias, the sixth caliph of the Saracens, sold it to a Jew, who broke it up, and loaded 900 camels with the metal. Rhodes, after being governed by its own kings, who were sometimes sufficiently powerful to hold in subjection the adjoining parts of Asia Minor, fell a prey to the Romans; then to the Saracens; after which it was retaken by the Greeks, who held possession of it about 600 years; when it was wrested from them by the Seljukian Turks; from whom it was again taken by the knights of St John of Jerusalem, who kept possession of it till the year 1552; when it was taken by the Ottoman Turks, after a year's siege of the city of Rhodes, and the loss of 90,000 men; the knights retiring to Malta. It is still in the hands of this barbarous people; but it is chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who are under the spiritual direction of an archbishop, residing in the city of Rhodes, who has also under his jurisdiction, according to Mr Connor, the following islands: Leros, the seat of a bishop, with about 600 Greeks; Calymne, under the bishop of Leros, 3000; Nisera, 1200; Delos (not the celebrated island of the same name), 1000; Syrne, 3200; and Karke, 600. The Greek population of Rhodes amounts to about 18,000. The number of Jews is about 1000. — Mansford. — Ed.

e This is a sea-port of Lycia, formerly beautified with a fair harbour and many temples, whereof one was dedicated to Apollo, and had an oracle in it, for wealth and credit not inferior to that of Delphi. — Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

f But if the persons who dissuaded St Paul from going to Jerusalem, were really moved by the Holy Ghost to do this, how could he act contrary to their advice, without opposing what the Spirit of God required, and running himself rashly into what it did forbid? Now to this it may be said, that all that the Spirit discovered to the disciples of Tyre, was, that if St Paul pursued his journey, he would certainly meet with very cruel usage; and therefore, out of pure kindness and concern for his welfare, they intreated him to consult his own safety, and not to expose himself to the malice of his enemies, by going to a place where they were so violently bent against him. Their dissuading him therefore was properly the effect of their love, and the result of what the Spirit had foretold them; but no part of the Spirit's instructions to St Paul to desist from his journey. Himself tells us, 'that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, that bonds and afflictions abide him,' (Acts xx. 23.) But this, we may be sure, was not to prevail with him to abandon the work of the gospel, but rather to arm him with strength and resolution to accomplish it, without giving himself any pain about the perils that would ensue. — W'hithy's and Beauvois's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

g This city was anciently called Acho; but when Ptolemy

A. M. 4062. A. D. 58; OR, A. M. 5469. A. D. 58, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10, TO THE END.

and there having but just saluted the brethren, they came by land the next day to Cæsarea of Palestine, and lodged at the house of Philip, the deacon and evangelist, ^a who had four daughters, all endued with the gift of prophecy. During their stay in this place, the prophet Agabus came from Jerusalem, and taking St Paul's girdle, ^b bound his own hands and feet with it, thereby intimating, that the owner of it should be served in the same manner by the Jews at Jerusalem, and by them be delivered over into the hands of the Gentiles. But St Paul's constancy was not in the least shaken by all these predictions, being ready, as he told those who were dissuading him from going, not only to suffer bonds, but

I. had enlarged it, it took its name from him; though since its subjection to the Turks, it has recovered some resemblance of its former name, it being now called Aceæ or Acra. As to its situation, it enjoys all possible advantages both by sea and land; for on its north and east sides, it is compassed with a spacious fertile plain; on the west, it is washed by the Mediterranean sea; and on the south, by a large bay, which extends itself from the city, as far as Mount Carmel. This made it one of the fairest and most commodious cities in Galilee; and for a long time, it was the theatre of contention between the Christians and infidels, till, having divers times changed its masters, it was at last, after a long siege, finally taken by the Turks, A. D. 1291, and by them destroyed in such a manner, that besides a large Kane, wherein the French factors have taken up their quarters, one mosque, and a few poor cottages, there is nothing to be seen, but a vast spacious ruin; though even here there are some remains, such as those of the church of St Andrew and St John, the convent of the Knights Hospitalers, and the palace of the Grand Master of that order, which distinguished themselves from the general heap by certain marks of superior strength and magnificence.—Mauvrell's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem.—Acre has been rendered famous in our own times by the successful resistance made by our countryman Sir Sydney Smith, aided by the celebrated Djeddar Pasha, to the designs of the French under Napoleon Buonaparte. Since this period, the fortifications have been considerably increased; and although to the eye of an engineer they may still be very defective, Acre may be considered as the strongest place in Palestine. Mr Connor says, on the authority of the English Consul, that there are about 10,000 inhabitants in Acre; of whom 3000 are Turks, and the remainder Christians, chiefly Catholics.—Mansford.—Ed.

^a An evangelist is a preacher of the gospel, who, being settled in no particular place, was by the apostles sent into different parts of the world, either to confirm the churches which they had founded, or, by his own labour and application, to found new ones himself. St Paul makes mention of this order of men, and ranks them next to the apostles and prophets, (Eph. iv. 2.) and to let us know that marriage is not inconsistent with any sacred function, St Luke acquaints us, that this deacon and evangelist had four daughters. And indeed the rules which St Paul gives Timothy, are a sufficient demonstration, that he allowed bishops as well as deacons to be married men. Nor is there any thing, either in scripture or antiquity, that denies them that liberty. For it is evident, that St Peter had a wife, (Mat. viii. 14.) and that St Paul asserts his right to marry, if he pleased, (1 Cor. ix. 5.) Ignatius affirms, that he had a wife as well as St Peter, and others of the apostles; and St Ambrose testifies, that all the apostles were married men, except St John and St Paul.—Beausobre's Annotations, Calmet's Commentary, and Comber on Ordination.

^b It was a common practice among the ancient prophets, to give their predictions a stronger impression, to foretel future events by figurative or symbolical actions. Thus Isaiah went naked and barefoot, to show what the people of Israel should meet with under the kings of Assyria, (Isa. xx. 2.) and Ezekiel was to pack up his household goods, and remove, to signify their being carried away into captivity, (Ezek. xii. 3.) and in like manner here Agabus uses a sign: he takes St Paul's girdle, and binds his own hands and feet with it, thereby denoting, that the Jews at Jerusalem would so bind the apostle, and deliver him to the Gentiles, first to the Roman governor of Judea, and afterwards to Nero, the Roman emperor.—Calmet's Commentary, and Burkitt's Annotations.

even death itself, for the sake of Christ and his religion; so that, finding his resolution immovable, they importuned him no more, but left the event to the will of God; whereupon he and his companions set forward on their journey, and having arrived at Jerusalem before the feast of Pentecost, were received by the Christians there with the utmost demonstrations of joy.

The next day, Paul and his company went to the house of St James, the apostle, and bishop of Jerusalem, where the rest of the elders and governors of the church were met together. After mutual salutations, he gave them an account of the success he had met with in the propagation of Christianity among the Gentiles; for which they all glorified God; but withal told him, 'That since he was now come to a place where there were many thousands of Jewish converts, who all retained a mighty zeal and veneration for the law of Moses, and who had been informed of him, that in every place he taught the Jews whom he had converted, to renounce circumcision, and other ritual observances, the best expedient to obviate their clamours, would be for him to ^c join himself to four men who were just then going to accomplish a vow of Naziritism, to perform the usual rites and ceremonies with them, to be at the charge of having their heads shaved, and to provide such sacrifices as the law directed; whereby it would appear that the reports spread of him were groundless, and that himself was an observer of the Mosaic institutions.' To this advice Paul consented; and taking the four Nazarites with him to the temple, told the priests, that as the time of their vow was now expired, and their purification regularly performed, they were come to make their oblations according to law. ^d ^c The better to understand this, we must observe, that among the Jews it was accounted a kind of meritorious action to contribute to the expence of the sacrifices and offerings, which those who had taken upon them a vow of Naziritism were to make, when the time of the vow came to be accomplished. Thus Josephus, to magnify the zeal and devotion of Herod Agrippa, king of the Jews, tells us, 'that he caused several Nazarites to be shaved;' whereby he means, that he bore the expence of the whole ceremony: and Maimonides informs us, that he who would partake of the merits of another's Naziritism, went to the temple, and said to the priest, 'such an one will finish his vow, and I intend to defray the charge of his tonsure, either in part, or in the whole;' and whoever did so, was reputed to partake in the merits of him who had fulfilled his vow.—Calmet's Commentary, and Dictionary.

^d The conduct of Paul on this occasion enables us fully to understand his views with respect to the obligation of observing the law of Moses. He had constantly told the Gentiles, that there was no necessity for their observing any part of it; and he had been equally explicit to the Jews, in telling them that the law was of no effect at all in procuring their justification: if they continued to observe its ceremonies, they were to look upon them merely as ceremonies; and, accordingly, when he was living with Gentiles, who cared nothing for the law, he felt no scruples in disregarding its precepts; but when he was living with Jews, whose consciences would have been hurt by a neglect of the legal ceremonies, he observed all the customs in which he had been brought up. His conduct on the present occasion was exactly in conformity with this principle. Having consulted with James, who still continued at Jerusalem as the resident head of the Christian church, and who perfectly agreed with Paul in his notions about the law, he took upon himself the vow of a Nazarite, and appeared publicly in the temple, as a person who submitted implicitly to the law of Moses. This conformity, though it might have satisfied the Judaizing Christians, was not sufficient to remove the prejudices which the unbelieving Jews had conceived against the apostle. Seeing him upon one occasion in the temple, they got together a crowd of people, with the

A. M. 4062. A. D. 58; OR, A. M. 5469. A. D. 58, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

These oblations were to be continued for seven days, which were now almost ended, when certain Jews from Asia, who had there been opposers of St Paul, finding him in the temple, began to raise an uproar, and laying hold on him, called out to the rest for help, because 'this is the fellow,' said they, 'who, in all places, vents doctrines injurious to the prerogative of the Jewish nation, destructive to the institutions of the law, and abhorrent to the sacredness of this place, which, by his bringing uncircumcised Greeks into it, he has grossly profaned.' This they affirmed, because they had seen Trophimus ^a in the city with him; and hereupon they seized him, dragged him out of the temple, shut the gate upon him, and would certainly have killed him had not Claudius Lysias, commander of the Roman garrison in the castle of Antonia, ^b come with a considerable force to his rescue and deliverance. As he was going into the castle, Paul, addressing himself to the governor ^c in Greek, desired the liberty to speak to him; but the governor, supposing him to be the Egyptian, ^d who, not many years before, avowed intention of putting him to death. Nor would they have failed in their purpose, if the commander of the Roman garrison, who was always on the watch to prevent an insurrection, had not suddenly come upon them with his troops, and rescued Paul out of their hands.—Burton's History of the Church.—Ed.

^a This Trophimus was a disciple of St Paul, a Gentile by religion, and an Ephesian by birth. After his conversion, he accompanied our apostle wherever he went, and very probably followed him to Rome, and forsook him not in his bonds. After that St Paul obtained his liberty, some pretend that he went into Spain, and passing through the country of the Gauls, left Trophimus there in the capacity of their bishop. But it is not a little difficult to reconcile this with what the apostle writes to Timothy, namely, that he had left Trophimus sick at Miletus, (2 Tim. iv. 20.), unless we can suppose that he returned into Asia again, about a year after that St Paul had left him at Arles, and, as the Greeks will have it, accompanying him to Rome again, at the same time that the apostle suffered, had his head likewise struck off by Nero's command.—Calnet's Commentary and Dictionary.

^b This was a tower or fortress, where the Romans kept a constant garrison at Jerusalem. It was originally built by the Asmonean princes, who called it Baris; but Herod the Great, having repaired it changed its name, in honour of his friend M. Anthony. It was situated towards the west angle of the temple, upon an eminence cut steep on all sides, and inclosed with a wall three hundred cubits high. It was built in the form of a large square, having within the magnificence of a palace, and the conveniences of a city; and without, several fortifications, and a tower at each corner to strengthen and defend it. So that, considering its form and situation, we may be allowed to say, that it was a citadel to the temple, even as the temple was, in some sort, a citadel to the town.—Calnet's Dictionary, and Fleury's Ecclesiastical History.

^c That Lysias was no Roman is plain from his telling St Paul, that 'with a great sum he had purchased his freedom,' (Acts xxii. 28.), but that he was a Greek, we may, in some measure, learn from the common analogy of his name; and therefore it was no bad policy in our apostle to address the governor in his own language; and the governor might be the rather pleased with it, because that, by this means, he might have an opportunity of knowing from St Paul himself the cause of the present tumult.—Calnet's Commentary.

^d While Felix was procurator of Judea, there came a certain person, ^e says Josephus, 'out of Egypt to Jerusalem, setting up for a prophet, and persuading the people to follow him to the top of Mount Olivet, some five furlongs from the city; for when he came thither, he told them, he would but speak the word, and immediately they should see the walls of Jerusalem fall flat to the ground, and make way for them to enter the city. But when Felix came to hear of this adventure, he fell upon them with his horse and foot, killed four hundred upon the spot, took two hundred, and put the Egyptian to flight.' It is to this story, no doubt, that Lysias had raised a sedition in Judea, and headed a party of four thousand profligate wretches, seemed to refuse him that favour, until the apostle, informing him that he was a Jew of Tarsus, a freeman of a rich and honourable city, and therefore humbly hoped, that he would not deny him the privilege of vindicating himself, the governor consented; and the apostle, standing upon the stairs, and making signs for silence, began his speech ^e in the Hebrew language; which, when the people heard, they were a little pacified, and stood attentive to him while he gave them a particular account of his birth and education; of his extraordinary zeal for the rites and customs of their religion; of his violent persecution of the Christians in all parts, whereof the Sanhedrim could bear him witness; of the miraculous manner of his conversion, and of the commission which he immediately received from God to preach salvation to the Gentiles. Thus far the people heard him with patience; but when he proceeded to defend his practice in preaching to the Gentiles, they could contain themselves no longer, but unanimously cried out to have the villain put to death; and the more to express their indignation, threw off their clothes, and cast dust into the air, as if they had intended that moment to stone him. But Lysias, to avoid farther tumult, ordered him to be carried into the castle, and to be examined by scourging; ^f until he confessed what it was alludes, and therefore it seems to be a mistake in Grotius, and others, to say, that the Egyptian mentioned by Josephus, was later than these times; for it is apparent from Josephus himself, both in his Antiquities, (b. xx.) and his history of the Jewish Wars, (b. ii.) that this Egyptian marched his rabble up to Jerusalem in the first or second year of the reign of Nero; whereas it was not till the fourth of Nero, that St Paul made his last journey to Jerusalem.—Hammond's and Whitty's Annotations.

^e To give some account of the apostle's conduct in this particular, we must observe, that there were two sorts of Jews at this time; some who used no other language in their common discourse, nor allowed of any bible in their religious assemblies, but the Hebrew; and these St Chrysostom calls οἱ βαβυλῆες Ἑβραῖοι, profound Hebrews; others that spake Greek, and used the Greek translation of the bible in their places of worship; and these were styled Hellenists. Of this latter sort was St Paul, because, as we may observe in his writings, he always makes use of the Greek translation of the Old Testament; so that, in this respect, he might not be so acceptable to the other sort. Those of them who were converted to Christianity, had great prejudices against him, (Acts xxi. 21.), which is said to be the reason why he concealed his name in the epistle written to the Hebrews; and as for those who were not converted, they could not so much as endure him; and this is the reason which Chrysostom gives why he preached to the Hellenists only, (Acts ix. 28.) That therefore he might avert the great displeasure which the Jews had conceived against him, he here speaks to them in the language which they best knew, and most esteemed; and they, by his compliance in this respect, were so far pacified, as to give him audience. For they were well enough pleased to hear him discourse of matters relating to religion, and especially of the vocation of the Gentiles, in a language which the Romans did not understand; whereas, had he, in the course of his apology, exposed the contempt and hatred which the Jews entertained of all heathens, in a language which the chief captain and his men were acquainted with, and in such a light as his known eloquence would have enabled him to do, it is not to be imagined, what terror, or confusion at least, he would have brought upon his enemies. So that it was a point of charity, as well as prudence in him to speak to them in Hebrew, that thereby he might both screen them from the resentment of the soldiery, and cure them, if possible, of their false prejudices against him.—Hammond's Annotations, and Calnet's Commentary.

^f As Lysias did not understand Hebrew, he could not tell what the purport of St Paul's speech to the people was; but, by their mad and outrageous behaviour, he guessed, that he must he had done that so much exasperated the Jews against him.

A. M. 4062. A. D. 58; OR, A. M. 5469. A. D. 58, &c. FROM ACTS. i. 10. TO THE END.

While the licitor was binding him in order to his punishment, Paul asked the centurion that stood by, whether the Roman laws permitted them to treat, in this manner, a citizen, even before any sentence was passed upon him? which, when the centurion heard, without making any reply, he went directly to the governor, and advised him to act cautiously in this affair, because the prisoner, as he understood, was a Roman citizen; and a citizen indeed he was by birth-right, ^a whereas the governor himself was such only by purchase. ^b This made him waive all farther thoughts of scourging him, as being not a little afraid, that he had already done more than he could answer; but being desirous to know the bottom of the matter, the next day he convened the Sanhedrim, and brought down Paul, and set him before them.

The sight of so awful an assembly struck no terror into the apostle, who began his apology with an open declaration of the integrity and good intentions of his heart: 'Men, and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience' have said something very provoking, either against the authority of their law, or the dignity of their nation, and therefore he was willing to know the truth of it from himself. Scourging was a method of examination used by the Romans and other nations, to force such as were supposed guilty to confess what they had done, what were their motives, and who were accessory to the fact. Thus Tacitus tells us of Herenius Gallus, that he received several stripes, that it might be known for what price, and with what confederates, he had betrayed the Roman army. It is to be observed, however, that the Romans were punish in this wise, not by whips and scourges, but by rods only and therefore it is, that Cicero, in the oration pro Rabirio, speaking against Labienus, tells his audience, that the Porcian law permitted a Roman to be whipped with rods, but he, by a good and merciful man, (speaking ironically,) had done it with scourges; and, what is further observable, neither by whips nor rods could a citizen of Rome be punished, unless he was first adjudged to lose his privilege, to be uncitizenized, or declared an enemy to the commonwealth, and then he might be either scourged or put to death; for the form of disfranchising him was this, 'Licitor, bind his hands, or cover his face, hang him, scourge him, either within or without the suburbs;' all which shows the great propriety of the apostle's question to the centurion, 'is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?' (Acts xxii. 25.)—Calmet's Commentary, Whitby's, and Hammond's Annotations.

^a In what manner St Paul obtained this privilege, the learned are not agreed; but it seems to make far for the opinion of those who think that the people of Tarsus had it bestowed on them by the favour of some emperor, that Dio Cassius, b. xlvii. reports, that they sided so far with Julius Cæsar in the civil war, and afterwards with Octavius, that the city obtained the name of Julio-polis, and was honoured with the greatest privileges; which makes Carthasianus, and the gloss upon 2 Tim. iv. 12. say more fully, that the inhabitants received this freedom, because they met the Roman ambassadors with peace and crowns, and that Paul's father going out with arms, received the penula or cloak, as a mark and ensign of a Roman citizen, 2 Tim. iv. 13.—Whitby's Annotations.

^b Photius, in one of his letters, tells us about what time it was that the privileges of a Roman citizen came to be enjoyed, not only by those who were natives of the place, but by as many as either by favour or money were made partakers of that appellation; and several historians have observed, that under the first emperors, it was highly valued, and cost dear; but that in the reign of Claudius it came to be disesteemed, and purchased at a very low rate.—Jammond's and Beausobre's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^c The apostle, by a good conscience, does not mean here a conscience void of all error and offence; for he owns himself to have been guilty of a great sin in persecuting the church of Christ, (1 Tim. i. 13.) but such a conscience as acted according before God, until this day.' This asserting of his innocence, Ananias, the high-priest, looked upon as a kind of reflection upon the justice of their tribunal, and therefore, ordered the officers that stood near him to strike him on the face; an indignity this which the apostle resented with severity of language; ^d but when the standers-by accused him with calumniating the high-priest, he excused himself, by saying, that he did not know, or could not well believe, that a person who had given such unjust orders could be invested with so sacred a character. ^e to his persuasion that he ought so to act; in which sense he says, that when he blasphemed against Christ, and persecuted his church, he did it out of a belief, that 'he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus,' (Acts xxvi. 9.) so that the sense of the apostle is, while I was persuaded that the Christian religion was false, I persecuted it with the utmost rigour; but, as soon as I came to perceive its divine institution, I declared for it, and have, ever since, maintained it, even to the hazard of my life. The religion of the Jews I did not forsake out of any hardships that I required, or any prejudice I had conceived against its precepts; nor did I embrace that of the Christians upon any other account than a full conviction of its truth and veracity. I was a good Jew, in short, as long as I thought it my duty to be so; and when I thought it my duty to be otherwise, I became a zealous Christian; in all which God knows the sincerity of my heart, and is witness of my uprightness.—Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^d The apostle's words are these, 'God shall smite thee, thou whited wall.' A whited wall was a proverbial expression, denoting a hypocrite of any kind; and the propriety of it appears in this, that as the wall had a fair outside, but nothing but dirt or sticks and stones within, so the high-priest had the outward appearance of a righteous judge, sitting as one that would pass judgment according to law, and yet commanding him to be punished for speaking the truth, and so condemning the innocent, against the law of nature, as well as that of Moses, (Lev. xix. 15.) Our blessed Saviour makes use of a comparison much of the same nature, when he calls the scribes and Pharisees, 'whited sepulchres, which appear beautiful outwards, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness,' (Mat. xxiii. 27.) And we need but look into the history of the ancient prophets, and there observe, with what an air of authority Elijah and Elisha speak to the kings of Israel, and with what boldness Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, reproach the priests, the princes, and the people of Judah, with their transgressions, to justify our apostle, in taking the same freedom with this proud pontiff, who belied his character by his unjust proceedings. It is to be observed, however, in further vindication of St Paul, that these words of his, 'God shall smite thee,' are a prediction, and not an imprecation; and a prediction which, according to Josephus, was fulfilled in a short time; for when, in the government of Florus, his son Eleazar set himself at the head of a party of mutineers, who, having made themselves master of the temple, would permit no sacrifices to be offered for the emperor, and being joined by a company of assassins, compelled persons of the best quality to fly for their safety into sinks and vaults, Ananias and his brother Hezekias, were both drawn out of one of these places, and murdered: though Dr Lightfoot will have it, that he perished at the siege of Jerusalem.—Calmet's Commentary, Whitby's Annotations, and Joseph. Jewish Wars, b. ii. c. 17, 18.

^e It is asked, 1. Who this Ananias was? 2. How his being now called high-priest can suit the chronology, as it is certain, from Josephus, that he held the office much earlier? 3. How St Paul knew not that he was the high-priest? He must have known him by the external marks of office. These obscurities are cleared up on examining the special history of this period; and the light thrown on them extends to the following chapters; insomuch, that it cannot be doubted, that this book was written, not after the destruction of Jerusalem, but by a person contemporary with the events there related. Ananias was the son of Nebedene, as is proved by Krebs from Josephus, and high-priest, when Helena, queen of Adiabene, supplied the Jews with corn from Egypt in the famine of the 4th year of Claudius. (Acts xi. 28.) St Paul, therefore, going at that time to Jerusalem, (Acts xv. 2.) must have known that he was then raised to that dignity. Soon after the first council of the apostles at Jer-

A. M. 4062. A. D. 58; OR, A. M. 5469. A. D. 58, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Perceiving, however, that the council consisted partly of Sadducees, and partly of Pharisees, to elude the malice of his enemies, he made open declaration, that he was a Pharisee, even as his father was before him, and that the great offence taken against him was his belief of a future resurrection; which so divided the council, that however the Sadducees, who were violent opposers of this article, were bent against him, the Pharisees, who were zealous maintainers of it, were for acquitting him; so that the dissent among them grew so high, that the governor, fearing lest Paul should be torn to pieces among them, commanded the soldiers to take him from the bar, and to return him back to the castle; where, to comfort him after all his frights and fears, God was pleased to appear to him that night in a vision, encouraging him to constancy and resolution, and assuring him, that as he had borne testimony to his cause at Jerusalem, so in despite of all his enemies, he should live to the same thing in Rome.

The next morning, above forty Jews entered into a wicked confederacy, which they ratified with an imprecation, never to eat nor drink until they had killed Paul, and having acquainted the Sanhedrim with their design, they thought it advisable that some of their body should solicit the governor to bring him down before them, under pretence of inquiring more accurately into his case, and that then, before he reached the court, they would not fail to way-lay and dispatch him. This conspiracy, however, was discovered to St Paul by a nephew of his, and by him imparted to Lysias; who immediately commanded two parties of foot, and one of horse, to be ready by nine o'clock that night, in order to conduct Paul, first to Antipatris, ^a and thence to Cæsarea, where Felix, ^b the governor of the province, had his residence. Lysias usalem, Ananias was dispossessed of his office, and on a dispute between the Samaritans and the Jews sent a prisoner to Rome, (J. Ant. l. xx. c. v.) whence he was released, and returned to Jerusalem. From that period he was not in the proper sense, the high-priest, though named so by Josephus, sometimes, as one of the chief-priests. Jonathan had been raised in the meantime to that dignity; and from the murder of Jonathan by Felix, (J. Ant. b. xx. c. vi.) to the high priesthood of Ismael, invested by Agrippa, (Ant. b. xx. c. vi.) this dignity remained vacant. Now it was precisely in this interval, that St Paul was apprehended in Jerusalem; and the Sanhedrim being destitute of a president, Ananias undertook of his own authority the discharge of that office, which he executed with the greatest tyranny. (Ant. b. xx. c. viii.) It is possible that St Paul, who had been only a few days at Jerusalem, might be ignorant, that he, who had been dispossessed of the priesthood, had taken a trust to which he was not entitled, and naturally exclaim, — 'I wist not,' &c.—or, if he knew, it was an indirect reproof, and tacit refusal to recognise usurped authority. Thus this obscure passage is brought into a clear light; and St Paul's imprisonment, the conspiracy against him with the consent of the Sanhedrim, and their petition to Festus to send for him to Cæsarea with intent to murder him on the road, are facts which correspond with the character of the times in Josephus, who mentions the principal persons, and attributes to them greater profligacy than St Luke.—Elsley's Annotations.—Ed.

^a This place, which was formerly called Capharsalama, (1 Mac. vii. 31.), stood upon the sea-coast, between Joppa and Cæsarea Palestine, but was of little or no repute, until it was rebuilt, or at least repaired and beautified, by Herod the Great, who, in honour of his father Antipater, changed its name.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^b Claudius Felix, who in Tacitus is likewise called Antonius, because he was a slave both to the emperor Claudius and his mother Antonia, was the brother of Pallas, the freed-man and first at the same time sent a letter to the governor signifying, 'That the person whom he had sent was a freeman of Rome; that the Jews had evil-treated him, and conspired against his life; that he had taken that method to secure him against their violence; and had ordered his enemies to appear before him at Cæsarea, to manage their charge and accusation.' This letter the governor received with great civility; and finding that Paul belonged to the province of Cilicia, promised him a fair hearing, as soon as his accusers should come down; and in the mean time ordered him to be secured in a place called 'Herod's judgment-hall.'

About five days after this, Ananias the high-priest, with others of the Sanhedrim, came down to Cæsarea, and brought with them an advocate, named Tertullus, ^d who, in a speech set off with all the insinuating arts of eloquence, to prepossess the governor ^e in their favour, accused St Paul ^f of being a seditious person, and a disturber of the public peace; who had set himself at the head of the sect of the Nazarenes, ^g and made no favourite of the emperor, by whose interest he obtained the government of Judea; but in the administration of it, practised all manner of violence, avarice, and lust. The above cited historian tells us of him, 'That he made his will the law of his government, ruled the province with all the authority of a king, and the insolence of a freed slave, whom neither shame nor fear could restrain.' He stuck at no manner of cruelty or injustice, having caused Jonathan the high-priest to be assassinated, merely because he sometimes reminded him of his mal-administration; and to gratify his debauchery, he scrupled not to violate all laws, both human and divine; for being in love with Drusilla, who was married to Azizus king of the Emisenes, by the help of Simon the magician, a Jew of Cyprus, he took her from her husband's bed; ^h and, in defiance of all law and right, kept her for his own wife. ⁱ In short, his government was so grievous to the Jews, that they recured his recall, A. D. 60. And as several of them went to Rome after him, to complain of his extortions, and other acts of violence, he had undoubtedly been executed, had not his brother's credit preserved him.—Calnet's Commentary, Beausobre's Annotations, and Joseph. Antiq. b. xx. c. 5, 6.

^c The word ἡγεμόν, which we render judgment-hall, is properly of Latin extract, and signifies the house where the chief Roman governor lived; and this in Cæsarea is called Herod's prætorium, because it was a magnificent palace, which Herod the Great had built for his own habitation whenever he should go to Cæsarea; but which in after-times, the Roman governors made use of for the place of their abode, as well as a place of confinement for some particular prisoners.—Calnet's Commentary.

^d It seems very likely that this Tertullus, whose name was properly Latin, was a Roman orator, or advocate, whom the Jewish rulers employed in his cause against Paul, as being a person better versed in the Roman language, and formalities of Roman courts, than they were.—Beausobre's Annotations.

^e In this preamble which Tertullus makes to Felix, there is a great deal of gross flattery, mixed with some truth; for though it be true, that Felix did some kindness to the Jewish nation, in delivering them from thieves and magicians that infested them; in destroying Eleazar, and Judas, who was at the head of one of these bands of robbers; and in defeating the Egyptian impostor, who drew so many thousands of poor people after him; yet had the orator been minded to have told the whole truth, he might have accused him of numberless injuries done the province, since no governor was ever known to exercise his authority with more injustice and cruelty than he; but this was not the business of one, who, in the beginning of his speech, was to insinuate himself into his favour.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Annotations, and Calnet's Commentary.

^f This is the only place in scripture where Christians are called Nazarenes, though the author and founder of their religion is frequently so called, from Nazareth, a city of Galilee, the place of his nativity, as some supposed, because it was that of his usual abode. At the first appearance of the gospel, Christians scruple to profane even the temple itself.' But, to the several parts of this accusation, the apostle, when permitted by Felix to make his defence, answered distinctly. The charge of sedition he utterly denied, and challenged them to prove, that they had ever found him so much as disputing in the temple, or stirring up the people in the synagogues, or any other place of the city. The charge of what they called heresy he readily admitted: but then he affirmed, that, long before him, this was the way in which all the patriarchs of the Jewish nation worshipped God, firmly believing another life, and a future resurrection. And as to the charge of profaning the temple, he allowed, indeed, that several times since his coming to Jerusalem, he had been there; but then it was without any multitude, and only to purify himself according to the Mosaic law. Felix gave both sides the hearing, but refused to make any final determination, until Lysias himself came down, of whom he might be more fully informed in the controversy; but in the mean time, he commanded, that, though Paul should be kept under a guard, yet his custody should be so free and easy, that none of his friends should be hindered from visiting or doing him any office of kindness.

A. M. 4062. A. D. 58; OR, A. M. 5469. A. D. 58, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

A few days after this, when his wife Drusilla, ^a who had been a Jewess, was come to Cæsarea, Felix being minded to have her hear Paul, ordered him to be brought before them, and gave him leave to speak freely concerning the doctrines of Christianity. In his discourse he took occasion particularly to insist upon the great obligation which the laws of Christ lay upon men to justice and righteousness towards one another, and to sobriety and chastity both towards themselves and others, from this consideration more especially, namely, the strict and impartial account that must be given in the day of judgment, of all the actions of their past lives, to be either eternally punished, or rewarded for them: subjects that were wisely adapted to the governor's condition and circumstances, and which stung his conscience were generally looked upon as a particular sect of the Jews, even as the Pharisees and Sadducees were. The heathens almost always confounded them with the Jews, nor was the distinction properly made, till after the destruction of the Jewish temple, and the large increase of Pagan converts. But as the word αἱρεσις, or sect, bears often an indifferent sense, both in the Scriptures, and in ancient Jewish writers, we might possibly suppose it so here, did not Justin Martyr (con. Tryph. p. 234) inform us, that the Jews very early sent their emissaries to all nations against the Christians, representing them as αἱρεσις ἀθεῖος, καὶ ἀνομος an atheistical and wicked heresy: and therefore we have reason to believe, that in this sense they accused St Paul as being a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes.—Calmet's Commentary, and Whitby's Annotations.

^a This Drusilla was the daughter of that Agrippa who put James to death, and imprisoned St Peter, and was herself miraculously smitten in the midst of his oration at Cæsarea, whereof we have given a full account before. This daughter of his passed for one of the greatest beauties of her age; but was far from being remarkable either for her piety or chastity. At first she was promised in marriage to Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus, king of Comagene, upon condition that he would submit to be circumcised; but when he refused to comply with that, the match broke off, and she was afterwards married to Azizus, as we said before, who accepted of the condition. When she left him, and took it in her head to live with Felix, who was a Gentile, she forsook her own and conformed to his religion, according to the testimony of Josephus, Antiq. b. xx. c. 5. And therefore, when St Luke calls her a Jewess, he must be understood thereby to denote her birth and parentage, rather than the form and profession of her religion.—Calmet's Commentary.

so feelingly, that he could not forbear trembling, which made him break off the apostle's discourse, with a 'go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.'

When Portius Festus ^b succeeded to the government of Judea, he found Paul still in prison, left there by his predecessor to gratify the Jews. ^c Upon his first coming to Jerusalem, the high-priest, and other members of the Sanhedrim, exhibited fresh accusations against him, and in order to his trial desired that he might be sent up to Jerusalem, meaning to assassinate ^d him by the way. But Festus, unwilling to grant their request, ordered them to come down to Cæsarea, where he himself would shortly be, and then he would not fail to do them justice. The Jews accordingly went down; and when Festus was seated on the tribunal, they renewed their charge, and produced their articles against him: which differed not much from what they had accused him of before Felix. But Paul defended himself so well, by making it appear, that he neither had offended against the Jewish laws, nor against the temple, nor against the emperor, that their charge soon fell to the ground for want of sufficient proof. Festus, however, being willing to oblige the Jews at his first coming to the government, proposed to the apostle his going up to Jerusalem, there to be judged of the matters that were alleged against him: but he, knowing full well the malice of his enemies, and being unwilling to trust himself in their power, boldly declared, that as he then stood at the emperor's judgment-seat, where he ought to have a final trial, if he had done anything worthy of death, he did not at all decline it; but that as he had injured none of the Jews, and they could prove nothing criminal against him, he ought not to be made a victim to their fury; and therefore, as he was a Roman, he appealed ^e to the emperor.

^b When Festus came into Judea, which was in the sixth or seventh year of Nero, he found all in desolation and distress: the country laid waste; the people forced from their habitations; their houses exposed to fire and pillage; and all at the mercy of a brutal rout of vagabond free-booters, who in great numbers ravaged up and down at pleasure. In these days there was a famous impostor likewise with a train of credulous rabble at his heels, whom he had deluded into an opinion, that if they did but follow him into such a wilderness no harm should ever befall them. Both these sorts of people the governor endeavoured to suppress; and the latter he did effectually; but had not time to accomplish the other, because, in the space of two years he died, and was succeeded in the province by Albinus.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xx. c. 7, 8.

^c He had sorely exasperated them by his unjust and violent proceedings while he continued in the government, and therefore upon his dismission, he thought to have pacified them in some measure, by leaving Paul, whom he might have discharged long before, still in custody, and still liable to become a prey to their greedy malice. But herein he found himself sadly mistaken; for no sooner was his disgrace at court known, than several of the principal Jews at Cæsarea took a journey to Rome on purpose to accuse him, and as we said before, would certainly have wrought his ruin, had not his brother Pallas, who was now in equal favour with Nero, as formerly he had been with Claudius, interceded for his pardon.—Joseph. Antiq. b. xx. c. 7.

^d Which might easily be done by any of the bands of robbers and assassins, those persons whom Josephus calls 'Sicarii,' from sica, or the short sword they wore, something betwixt the Persian scymitar and the Roman falchion, which at that time infested the whole province; and would have done it for a small sum of money, without any suspicion upon the true authors of his murder.—Calmet's Commentary.

^e This way of appealing was frequent among the Romans, introduced to defend and secure the lives and fortunes of the

A. M. 4063. A. D. 59; OR, A. M. 5470. A. D. 59, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Whereupon Festus, being not a little startled, first conferred with his own council, ^a and then, with some seeming emotion, told the apostle that since he had appealed unto Cæsar, unto Cæsar he should go.

Not many days after, king Agrippa, ^b with his sister Berenice, ^c and a numerous train, came to Cæsarea to populace from the unjust encroachments and over-rigorous severities of the magistrates: whereby it was lawful in cases of oppression, to appeal from them for redress and rescue; a thing more than once settled by the sanction of the Valerian laws. These appeals were generally made in writing, by appellatory libels given into the court, and containing an account of the appellant, the person against whom, and from whose sentence he did appeal; but where the cause was done in open court, it was enough for the criminal verbally to declare that he did appeal. In great and weighty cases, the appeal was made to the prince himself: whereupon not only at Rome, but in all the provinces of the empire, every procurator and governor was strictly forbidden to execute, scourge, bind, or put any badge of servility upon a citizen, or any that had the privilege of a citizen, who had made his appeal, or any wise hinder him from going to Rome to obtain justice at the hands of the emperor, who had as much regard to the liberty of his subjects, says the law itself, as they could have for their good-will and obedience to him. And this was exactly St Paul's case: who, knowing that he should have no fair and equitable dealings at the hands of the governor, when once he came to be swayed by the Jews, his sworn and inveterate enemies, appealed from him to the emperor; which was a privilege so often, so plainly settled by the Roman laws, that Festus durst not deny his demands.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

^a Some annotators are of opinion, that the persons with whom the governor advised upon this occasion, were part of the Sanhedrim who were come to Cæsarea to prosecute Paul; but we can scarce think, that any of this body of men would have counselled him to admit of St Paul's appeal, or to send him to Cæsar out of their reach; and therefore we suppose, that as these governors of provinces were not always great lawyers, though they might sometimes have very nice controversies come before them, they were usually provided with men of sufficient abilities in the Roman laws, who, sitting behind a veil or curtain, drawn between them and the governor's tribunal, were ready in all difficult cases, to assist him with their advice.—Whitby's Annotations, and Calnet's Commentary.

^b This prince, who was the son of Agrippa, surnamed Herod, of whom we read so much in the 12th chapter of the Acts, was at Rome with the emperor Claudius when he died. The emperor was inclined to have given him all the dominions which his father possessed; but those who were about him dissuaded him from it; so that, sending Cuspius Fadus as procurator to Judea, he kept Agrippa still at court, until he was in a condition to reign. When Herod, king of Chalcis, his uncle by his father's side, died, he gave him his dominions: but soon after translated him to a larger kingdom; for he bestowed on him, not only all the territories formerly belonging to Philip the tetrarch, but added likewise the country of Abilene, which belonged to Lysanias. After the death of Claudius, his successor Nero, who had a great affection for Agrippa, to his other dominions added Julius in Peræa, and that part of Galilee to which Tarichæa and Tiberias belonged. When the war broke out between the Jews and the Romans, this prince was constrained to join his troops with those of Rome, to reduce his countrymen, and assist in the taking of Jerusalem. After the destruction of that city, he retired to Rome with his sister Berenice, with whom he had always lived in an indelicate manner, and there died at about seventy years of age.—Calnet's Commentary, and Dictionary, Eckard's and Fleury's Ecclesiastical Histories.

^c She was at first married to Herod, king of Chalcis, her own uncle by her father's side; but, after his death, she betook herself to her brother, and with him continued for some considerable time, till at length, being censured as having an incestuous familiarity with him, in order to justify herself, and wipe off the disgrace, she thought proper to be married again to Polemon, king of Cilicia; who, for the sake of her riches, was persuaded to be circumcised, that he might have her: but they did not live long together; and when she left her husband, she returned to her brother, with whom she behaved in such a manner, as made all the world, as well as the satirist, take notice of her: 'thence the make a visit and compliment to the new governor; who upon some occasion or other took an opportunity to entertain them with Paul's case; telling them, 'that Felix, upon his parting with the government, had left a certain prisoner, against whom some of the chief of the Jews had brought information, and immediately demanded judgment, which, according to the Roman law, ^d could not be done without first hearing the cause, and bringing the parties face to face; that to this purpose he had ordered his accusers to come to Cæsarea, but, upon the result, found, that the dispute between them was about matters of their own superstition, ^e and whether a person, whom they call Jesus, was really dead or alive; that being himself unacquainted with such kind of controversies, he had referred the prisoner to the Jewish sanhedrim; but that he, declining their judgment, had appealed to Cæsar; and that therefore he kept him still in prison, until he could meet with a convenient opportunity to send him to Rome.'

This account excited the curiosity of Agrippa, who was very desirous to see and hear the prisoner; ^f and accordingly, the king and his sister, accompanied with Festus, and other persons of quality, came into the court, with a pompous and magnificent retinue; and when Paul was brought forth before them, Festus acquainted the king, and the whole assembly, 'how much he had been solicited by the Jews, both at Cæsarea and Jerusalem, concerning the prisoner at the bar, that, as a notorious malefactor, he might be put to death; but that, having found him guilty of no capital crime, and the prisoner himself having appealed to Cæsar, he was determined to send him to Rome; that he was willing, however, to have well known gem which on the finger of Berenice became enhanced in value.—Agrippa gave it to his incestuous sister.—Joseph. Antig. b. xx. c. 5.—Juv. Sat. 6.

^d Of this law and custom of the Romans, Philo Judæus, speaking of their precepts, gives us this account—'they yielded themselves to be common judges, hearing equally the accusers and defendants, condemning no man unheard, prejudging no man, but judging without favour or enmity, according to the nature of the cause.—Hammond's Annotations.

^e The word in the original is Δεισιδαιμονία, that is, a vain and groundless fear of the gods: for the pious man, according to Varro, honours and fears God, but the superstitious man dreads him, and is seized with terror before him. And to the same purpose Maximus Tyrius tells us, that a man truly pious, looks upon God as a friend full of goodness: but the superstitious man serves him with sentiments of base and servile flattery. Now, considering that Festus was addressing himself to Agrippa and Berenice, who were certainly Jews, one may be apt to think it a breach of good manners for him to call the religion they professed by no better a name than that of superstition: but then we must observe, that he is supposed to speak here in the common strain of heathens, who generally looked upon all Jewish ceremonies as superstitious usages; and that he made no scruple to express himself in this manner, as either accounting himself so much superior to such petty princes, that he thought he might make free with them, or as judging that themselves would not be offended at his representing the particular points in dispute between St Paul and his adversaries in such a contemptuous light.—Calnet's Dictionary and Commentary.

^f As Herod, the father of this Agrippa, had been so active an instrument in endeavouring to destroy Christianity, having killed James, and was about to have put Peter to death also, had not God sent him to his own place, there is no doubt that Agrippa had heard much about Christianity; and as to St Paul, his conversion was so very remarkable that his name, in connexion with Christianity, was known, not only throughout Judea, but through all Asia Minor and Greece. Agrippa, therefore, might naturally wish to see and hear a man of whom he had heard so much.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

A. M. 4061. A. D. 60; OR, A. M. 5471. A. D. 60, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

his cause again discussed before so judicious a person as Agrippa, that he might be furnished with some material instructions to send along with him, since it seemed absurd to him to send a prisoner to the emperor, without signifying his crimes.' When Festus had ended, and Agrippa had signified to St Paul, that he had liberty to answer for himself; after silence was made, he addressed himself chiefly to Agrippa, and thus began his speech:

'I think myself happy, O king Agrippa, in that I am permitted to make my defence against the accusations charged upon me by the Jews, before a person so exactly versed in all the rites and customs, the questions and controversies, of the Jewish law; for which reason I intreat your Majesty to hear me with patience. ^a My manner of life from my youth, which was among the Jews at Jerusalem, they all know, and that I was brought up under the institutions of the Pharisees, ^b a sect the strictest of all others in the Jewish religion. Accordingly, now I am accused for asserting the resurrection ^c of the dead, which is not only a doctrine acknowledged by the Pharisees, but a fundamental promise made by God of old, which the generality of the Jews ^d depend upon, and in hopes of which they spend their

^a From what has been alleged relating to Herod Agrippa, it is plain he was a zealous Jew, or at least appeared so at Jerusalem, and had educated all his children in the Jewish religion. This Agrippa, his son undoubtedly, maintained the same profession, and at this time he had, by permission of the emperor, the direction of the sacred treasury, the government of the temple, and the right of nominating the high priests, as we learn from Josephus. No wonder therefore that St Paul told Agrippa he knew him to be expert in all customs and questions which were among the Jews.—Lardner's Credibility.—ED.

^b That of the three sects which were then of greatest credit in Judea, the Pharisees were the most strict, and held in the greatest veneration, we have the testimony of Josephus, who, in more places than one, informs us, that this sect was thought to be more pious than others, and more exact in their knowledge of the customs of their fathers, and in the interpretation of their laws. For, as for the other two famous sects, the Sadducees, by denying the resurrection, and all future punishments, took away the rewards of a virtuous, and gave licence to a vicious life; and the Essenes, by being Jews, and yet separating themselves entirely from the worship of the temple, were guilty of a great schism, and, by making their prayers and religious addresses to the sun, as Josephus, who lived three years among them, testifies, were chargeable with idolatry.—Jewish Wars, b. ii. c. 7.—Whitby's Annotations.

^c But why should St Paul say, that he was accused for asserting the general resurrection: when it was only the resurrection of Christ that he was called in question for? Now, in answer to this it must be observed, that before our Saviour's passion, the doctrine which he preached was chiefly levelled against the vain traditions of the Scribes and Pharisees; but that after his resurrection, the testimony of the apostles being this, 'that Christ was risen from the dead,' which was directly contrary to the notion of the Sadducees, these people became their hottest enemies, being grieved, as the text expresses it, that they preached the resurrection of the dead through Jesus, (Acts iv. 1, 2.) as easily perceiving that the proof of the one, namely, that Christ was risen, was a confirmation of the general resurrection. As therefore the resurrection of Christ was a pledge and assurance of a general resurrection, it was impossible for the apostles to attest the one, without asserting the other, since in the truth of the thing, and according to the sentiments of the Jews themselves, the resurrection was to be effected by the Messiah; for which reason we find St Paul styling our Lord 'the first fruits of them that slept,' and declaring farther, 'that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' (1 Cor. xv. 20, 22).—Whitby's Annotations.

^d That the Jews had grounds sufficient in the writings of the Old Testament, to expect a future resurrection, is evident from time in constant piety and obedience to God; and yet for believing and expecting this, O king, I am accused and persecuted by the Jews. But why should it be thought an incredible thing that God, who is omnipotent, should raise the dead? I confess, indeed, that once I was of opinion, that I was bound in conscience to persecute this profession and doctrine of Christ; and accordingly, having obtained a commission from the high priest, many holy men and women in Jerusalem I not only hurried to prison, but when any of them were put to death, was myself not a little assenting and assisting in it. Nay, in other places too, I brought them before courts of judicature, by several methods of severity, forced them to deny Christ, and was so much enraged against them, that I compelled them to flee to the heathen cities, and even thither pursued them. To this purpose, having received authority from the Sanhedrim to go to Damascus, at noon-day, O king, I saw a light from heaven, far exceeding that of the sun, which struck me and those that accompanied me to the ground, and heard a voice in the Hebrew tongue, calling me by name, and admonishing me to forbear my cruel and persecuting temper; because, from that time, I was chosen to be a preacher and promoter of that doctrine which I was then labouring to destroy, and particularly commissioned to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, in order to convert them from their idolatrous worship to the service of the true God. In obedience therefore to this heavenly vision, I have ever since been very diligent in preaching the doctrines of repentance and reformation, not in Judea only, but in other nations; and not to the Jews only, but likewise to the Gentiles. This, O king, is my great crime, and for this it was that the Jews apprehended me in the temple, with a design to have murdered me; but being supported by a divine power, I continue in my duty to this day, asserting nothing but what is agreeable to Moses and the prophets, who have plainly foretold, that the Messiah should be put to death, and rise again, and, by his doctrine, enlighten both Jews and Gentiles.'

our Saviour's application of God's own words, 'I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob,' (Exod. iii. 6.) 'God is not the God of the dead, but of the living,' (Mat. xxii. 32.) Wherever God is styled the God of any one, it always signifies that he either is or will be the benefactor of that person; and in naming Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, he must mean it of their complete persons, which consisted of bodies as well as souls; and from hence it will follow, that as the troubles and afflictions, which these three patriarchs underwent in their life-time did not answer those favours and kindnesses which are included in the phrase of his being the God of any one, God was still engaged to make them happy after this life, and completely happy in their whole persons, that is, both in body and soul, which could only be effected by their resurrection. This is the deduction which our Saviour makes; but, when we read in the prophets, 'that the earth shall cast out the dead, and those that dwell in the dust shall arise,' (Isa. xxvi. 19.) and more expressly still, 'that many of them who sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to everlasting confusion,' (Dan. xii. 2.) we need less wonder that we find the martyrs in the Jewish church not doubting 'but that the Creator of the world would give them breath and life again, and would raise those up, who died for his laws, unto everlasting life,' (2 Maccab. vii. 9, 23.) Good reason therefore had the apostle to represent this as the hope of their tribes; for though the Sadducees denied it, yet, as Josephus informs us, they were but a handful of men in comparison; and whenever they came to bear offices, they were forced to profess the doctrine of the Pharisees, otherwise the common people would not have endured them.—Antiq. b. xviii. c. 2.—Whitby's Annotations.

A. M. 4064. A. D. 60; OR, A. M. 5471. A. D. 60, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

While he was thus discoursing, Festus, who happened to be no great master of the argument, was ready to think, that his talking in this abstruse manner must be the effect of some deliriousness, and therefore told him abruptly, that his too much learning a had made him mad. But to this he calmly replied, 'I am in my perfect senses, most noble Festus, and what I say, without excess or transport, is literally true. For this I appeal to Agrippa, before whom I take this freedom of speech, and am confident that he knows it to be true. The life, death, and resurrection of Christ, were things of public note, and cannot be a secret to him, who was a Jew born. Believest thou the prophets, O king? I am satisfied thou dost, and therefore cannot but know that their predictions are fulfilled in Christ.' This moving and persuasive eloquence so wrought upon Agrippa, that he could not forbear declaring, that the apostle had almost persuaded him to be a Christian.^b To which he readily replied, 'That he heartily wished, that not only he, but the whole company then present, were not only almost, but altogether, though not prisoners, as much Christians as himself was.'^c Upon this the assembly broke up; and when Agrippa and Festus had conferred together about Paul's case, they freely owned, that the accusation laid against him amounted neither to a capital offence, nor to any thing deserving imprisonment, but that, had he not appealed unto Cæsar, he might have been legally discharged.^d

His journey to Rome, therefore, being thus finally a Festus must have known from some other hand, that Paul was a learned man; because, in this speech of his, he gives us no indication of his proficiency either in the Greek or Roman literature; though he might think, from the terms which he heard him make use of, that the subject of his discourse must be vastly mysterious; for to hear him speak of the resurrection of the dead, of a vision and voice from heaven, of faith in Christ, of conversion from darkness to light, of deliverance from the power of Satan, of an inheritance among them that are sanctified, and of Christ's showing light unto the people, and to the Gentiles, which were so many enigmas to the governor, was enough to make him think, that there possibly might be some disorder in the apostle's brain that made him talk in so unintelligible a manner.—Calmel's Commentary.

b This seems to imply, that, since the time that they took it upon themselves at Antioch, the name of Christians was become their common appellation.—Beausobre's Annotations.

c While the apostle's heart glows with affection for their best interests, he wishes that they might enjoy all his blessings, if possible, without being obliged to bear any cross on the account. His holding up his chain, which was probably now detached from the soldier's arm, and wrapped about his own, must have made a powerful impression on the minds of his audience. Indeed, it appears they could 'bear the scene no longer;' the king was overwhelmed, and rose up instantly, and so did the rest of the council, and went immediately aside; and, after a very short conference among themselves, they unanimously pronounced him innocent; and his last word, παν δεσμων, 'bonds!' and the action with which it was accompanied, had made such a deep impression upon their hearts, that they conclude their judgment with that very identical word δεσμων. Would to God, says the apostle, that all who hear me this day were altogether such as I am, except these 'bonds!' The whole council say—'This man hath done nothing worthy of death nor of 'bonds!' δεσμων, 'bonds,' is echoed by them from the last words of the apostle; as we may plainly perceive that, seeing such an innocent and eminent man suffering such indignity, had made a deep impression upon their hearts.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

d Though this declaration of Agrippa would not secure Paul's deliverance, yet it might do him some service that a testimony to his innocence was pronounced by so learned and honourable a person of the Jewish nation and religion. Festus would pro-determined, he and some other prisoners of note,^e were committed to the charge of one Julius, a centurion, or captain of the legion called Augusta, having Luke the evangelist, Aristarchus, Trophimus, and some others, to accompany him in his voyage.^f About the latter end of September, they went on board a ship of Adramyttium,^g and coasting along Asia, arrived at Sidon; where Julius, who all along treated Paul with great civility, gave him leave to go ashore, and refresh himself. From Sidon they set sail, and came in sight of Cyprus; and, having passed over the seas of Cilicia and Pamphylia, landed at Myra,^h a port in Lycia, where this ship finished probably entertain a better opinion of him upon this account, and would give directions to the officer who attended him, to treat him with so much the greater regard. I shall only add, that though it might seem in this view an unhappy circumstance that Paul had made this appeal, yet as it was, at the time he made it, the properest method he could take for his own security, he would have reason to reflect upon it with satisfaction; and we before observed, that his visiting Rome under the character of a prisoner, was overruled by Providence to answer some important purposes. Comp. Phil. i. 12, &c.—Doddridge's Expositor.—Ed.

e It was common to send persons from Judea to be tried at Rome; numerous instances about this period are given in Jardner's Credibility, b. i. c. x. sect. 10.—Ed.

f 'When the fast was now already past,' is the signification of time in the text, (Acts xxvii. 9.), and without all controversy this was the great annual fast of expiation for the sins of the people of Israel, (Lev. xvi. 29.), which began on the tenth day of the month Tisri, answering to the 25th of our September. This was the commencement of their civil year; and therefore it is no wonder that St Luke should make use of this epocha, 'the fast being already past,' to denote a particular part of the year, since he wrote his gospel for the use of Christians, who, at this time, were chiefly Jewish converts, and consequently no strangers to this kind of language.—Hammond's and Whitby's Annotations, and Calmel's Commentary.

g Adramyttium was a maritime town of Mysia Major in Asia Minor, opposite the island of Lesbos, and was sometimes also called Pedasus, situated with its harbour and docks at the foot of Mount Ida, near the Cæcus. It gave its name to an arm of the Ægean Sea, and is supposed to have derived its designation from Adramys, the brother of Cræsus, by whom it was built, or from Hermon, one of the kings of Lydia, who, in the Phrygian language, was called Adramys. It is now termed La Andramiti, and is a wretched place, inhabited only by a few Greek fishermen. St Jerome and others have erroneously supposed this city to be the same as that built by Alexander the Great at the Canopic mouth of the Nile in Egypt, and which is understood to be the same as Thebes.—Scripture Gazetteer, Edin. 1837.—Ed.

h Lycia, a province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Phrygia, on the south by the Mediterranean, on the east by Pamphylia, and on the west by Caria. This country, or rather kingdom, was originally distinguished by the names of Mylias and Tremile, from the Myke or Solymi, a people of Crete, who settled there: the name Lycia being given to it at a subsequent period by Lycus, the son of Paudion. From the remotest age in the history of Lycia its inhabitants were commended for their sobriety and justice, but towards the commencement of the Christian era they became greatly degenerated, many of them being noted for piracy. Lycia being conquered by Cyrus, its inhabitants were still permitted to be governed by kings of their own, on paying an annual tribute to the Persian monarchs. They afterwards became subject, first, to the Macedonian, and then to the Roman empires, Lycia forming one of the Roman provinces of Asia Minor when the apostle Paul sailed from Myra, its metropolis, for Rome; (Acts xxvii. 5.) At that period the country contained twenty-three cities, besides large towns, the chief of which were Myra, Telmisus, Patara, Olympus, Phaselis, and Limyra. That Christianity was propagated in Lycia at a very early period, is beyond dispute, but whether, as the present Greeks affirm, Paul preached in Myra, and established there a Christian church, is destitute of proof. That city did, however, afterwards become the metropolitan of thirty-six suffragan sees. But, subsequently, the Mohanmedan imposture supplanted the

A. M. 4064. A. D. 60; OR, A. M. 5471. A. D. 60, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

its voyage. At Myra, Julius, and the prisoners that were under his care, went on board a ship of Alexandria, bound for Italy; and having passed by Cnidus,^a with much ado they made for Salmone, a promontory on the eastern shore of Crete: from whence, by many days' slow sailing, they arrived at a place called 'the Fair Havens,'^b on the coast of the same island. Here St Paul advised the centurion to put in and winter, because the season of the year was far advanced, and sailing,^c in those seas especially, was now become dangerous; but he, preferring the judgment of the master of the ship, and the wind at this instant blowing gently at south, they put again to sea, in hopes of reaching Phœnice, another harbour of Crete, where there was safe riding, and there to winter. It was not long however before they found themselves disappointed; for the calm southerly gale, which blew before, suddenly changed into a stormy and tempestuous north-east wind,^d which bore down all be-

Christianity which remained in the province; and, at the present time, the few Greek Christians who are still to be found within its limits, are almost as ignorant as their Turkish rulers, of that gospel which they profess to believe.—Sime's Sacred Geography.—Ed.

^a This is a city which stands on a promontory or foreland of the same name, in that part of the province of Caria which was more particularly called Doris, remarkable among the ancients for the worship of Venus; thence called by Horace, Regina Cnidi, and for the celebrated statue of that goddess, which was made by the great artificer Praxiteles.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament, and Whitby's Alphabetical Table.—Extensive ruins of this place, which is supposed to have been two miles in circumference, still remain.—Mansford.—Ed.

^b This port still remains, and is known by the same name; it is situated toward the northern extremity of the island.—Ed.

^c It is a common observation of mariners, that for some weeks before and after Michaelmas, there are at sea sudden and frequent storms, commonly called 'Michaelmas flaws,' which, at that time of the year, make sailing, especially in the Mediterranean, dangerous. Nor is this any new observation, but as old as Hesiod himself, who tells us, that at the going down of the Pleiades, which was at the end of autumn, navigation was hazardous: the very same thing that the apostle here asserts.—Hammond's Annotations.

^d Interpreters have been greatly perplexed with this word; and the ancient copyists not less so, as the word is variously written in the MSS. and Versions. Dr Shaw supposes it to be one of those tempestuous winds called 'Levancers,' which blow in all directions, from N. E. round by the E. to S. E. The euroclydon, from the circumstances which attended it, he says, 'seems to have varied very little from the true east point; for, as the ship could not bear, ἀντροφαλαμίτ, 'loof up,' against it, (ver. 15.) but they were obliged to let her drive, we cannot conceive, as there are no remarkable currents in that part of the sea, and as the rudder could be of little use, that it could take any other course than as the winds directed it. Accordingly, in the description of the storm, we find that the vessel was first of all under the island Claudia, (ver. 16.) which is a little to the southward of the parallel of that part of the coast of Crete from whence it may be supposed to have been driven; then it was tossed along the bottom of the gulf of Adria, (ver. 27.) and afterwards broken to pieces, (ver. 41.) at Melita, which is a little to the northward of the parallel above mentioned; so that the direction and course of this particular euroclydon seems to have been first at east by north, and afterwards, pretty nearly east by south.' These winds, called now 'Levancers,' and formerly it appears 'euroclydon,' were no determinate winds, blowing always from one point of the compass: euroclydon was probably then, what Levancer is now, the name of any tempestuous wind in that sea, blowing from the north-east round by east to the south-east; and therefore St Luke says, there rose against it, that is, the vessel, a tempestuous wind called euroclydon; which manner of speaking shows that he no more considered it to be confined to any one particular point of the compass, than our sailors do their Levancer. Dr Shaw derives εὐροκλύδων from εὐροσ κλύδων, 'an eastern tempest,' fore it, so that they were forced to let the ship drive; but, to secure it from splitting, they under-girt it; and, to prevent its running aground on the shallows, threw out a great part of its lading and tackle.

For fourteen days the company continued in this condition, without ever seeing either sun or stars, and began all now to give up their lives for lost; when St Paul, having a little blamed them for not taking his advice, desired them however to be of good courage, because he had assurance from heaven, that, whatever became of the ship, they should escape to an island, and not one of their lives be lost. On the fourteenth night, as the sailors were throwing the lead, and sounding, they found themselves nigh some coast; and apprehending they might strike upon some shelves in the dark, thought proper to come to an anchor, till the morning might give them better information. But, not staying for that, they were attempting to save themselves by getting into the boat, when St Paul, perceiving it, told the centurion, that unless they all staid in the ship, none could be safe; whereupon the soldiers cut the ropes, and let the boat drive. A little before day-break, St Paul persuaded them to take some nourishment, because, in all that time of danger, which had been ^e for fourteen days, they had eaten in a manner nothing; and to encourage them to do this, he assured them again, that 'not a hair of their heads should perish.' In the morning they discovered land; and, discerning a creek, which seemed to make a kind of haven, they resolved, if possible, to put in there; but, in their passage, unexpectedly fell into a place where two seas met, and where the fore-part of the ship striking upon a neck of land that ran out into the sea, the hinder part was soon beaten in pieces by the violence of the waves. When the soldiers saw this, they proposed putting all the prisoners to the sword, lest any of them should swim to land, and make their escape; but the centurion, who was willing to save Paul, by no means allowing of that, gave orders that every one should shift for himself; and the issue was, that, some by swimming, others on planks, and others on pieces of the broken ship, to the number of two hundred and seventy-six persons, they all got safe to shore.

The country upon which they were cast, as St Paul which is the very meaning affixed to a Levancer at the present day. The reading of the Codex Alexandrinus is εὐροκλύδων, 'the north-east wind,' which is the same with the euro-aquilo of the Vulgate. This reading is approved by several eminent critics; but Dr Shaw, in the place referred to above, has proved it to be insupportable.—Dr A. Clarke, on Acts xvii. 14.—Ed.

^e The words in the text are, 'this is the fourteenth day that ye have continued fasting, having taken nothing,' (Acts xxvii. 33.) Now, because it was impossible for them, without a miracle, to continue fasting fourteen days, without eating any thing, some have been induced to render the words thus, 'ye have continued expecting this day, which is the fourteenth day,' that is, waiting to see the success of it, which it seems, in the opinion of the mariners, was a critical day to them, wherein their danger was at the highest, and therefore they eat nothing all that day, as having no leisure to consider hunger, when their greater danger and more immediate fear was drowning. But as we read of nothing of this critical day, so the long fasting mentioned in ver. 21. determines the sense otherwise, and makes St Paul's words indeed amount to no more than a common familiar expression, that may, almost every day, be heard at any table, where there happens to be a puny stomach: 'you have eat nothing,' says the master of the house to such a one, 'very little, or next to nothing.'—Whitby's, Hammond's, and Beaucobre's Annotations.

A. M. 4065. A. D. 61; OR, A. M. 5472. A. D. 61, &c. FROM ACTS. i. 10. TO THE END.

had foretold, was an island called a Melita, now Malta; and the natives of the place received them with great civility and kindness, making them fires to dry their wet clothes, and cherish their benumbed limbs. But as Paul was throwing some sticks upon the fire, b a viper dis-

a There were two islands of this name: one in the Adriatic Gulf, or Gulf of Venice, on the coast of Illyricum, and near to Epidaurus; the other in the Mediterranean Sea, between Sicily and Africa, and now called Malta. It is about fifty miles from the coast of Sicily; twenty miles long, and twelve miles in its greatest breadth; and about sixty miles in circumference. It is one immense rock of white soft freestone, with about one foot depth of earth on an average, and most of this has been brought from Sicily! It produces cotton, excellent fruits, and fine honey; from which it appears the island originally had its name; for Μελι, 'melli,' and in the genitive case Μελιτος, 'Melitos,' signifies honey. Others suppose that it derived its name from the Phœnicians, who established a colony in it, and made it a place of refuge, when they extended their traffic to the ocean, because it was furnished with excellent harbours, on the east and west shores: hence, in their tongue, it would be called מליטה 'Meliteh,' 'escape or refuge, from מלט מלט, 'to escape.' The Phœnicians were probably the first inhabitants of this island: they were expelled by the Phœnicians; the Phœnicians by the Greeks; the Greeks by the Carthaginians; the Carthaginians by the Romans, who possessed it in the time of the apostle; the Romans by the Goths; the Goths by the Saracens; the Saracens by the Sicilians, under Roger, earl of Sicily, in 1190. Charles V., emperor of Germany, took possession of it by his conquest of Naples and Sicily; and he gave it in 1525 to the Knights of Rhodes, who are also called the Knights of St John of Jerusalem. In 1798, this island surrendered to the French, under Buonaparte, and in 1800, after a blockade of two years, the island being reduced by famine, surrendered to the British, under whose dominion it still remains, (1838.) Every thing considered, there can be little doubt that this is the Melita at which St Paul was wrecked, and not at that other island in the Adriatic, or Venetian Gulf, as high up northward as Illyricum. The following reasons make this greatly evident: 1. Tradition has unvaryingly asserted this as the place of the apostle's shipwreck. 2. The island in the Venetian Gulf, in favour of which Mr Bryant so learnedly contends, is totally out of the track in which the euroclydon must have driven the vessel. 3. It is said, in ver. 11. of this chapter, that another ship of Alexandria, bound, as we must suppose, for Italy, and very probably carrying wheat thither, as St Paul's vessel did, (chap. xxvii. 38.) had been driven out of its course of sailing, by stress of weather, up to the Illyrican Melita, and had been for that cause obliged to winter in the isle. Now this is a supposition which, as I think, is too much of a supposition to be made. 4. In St Paul's voyage to Italy from Melita, on board the Alexandrian ship that had wintered there, he and his companions landed at Syracuse, (ver. 12, 13.) and from thence went to Rhegium. But if it had been the Illyrican Melita, the proper course of the ship would have been, first, to Rhegium, before it reached Syracuse, and needed not to have gone to Syracuse at all; whereas, in a voyage from the present Malta to Italy, it was necessary to reach Syracuse, in Sicily, before the ship could arrive at Rhegium in Italy.—Dr. A. Clarke, (Acts xviii. 1.)—Ed.

b This serpent, which in the sacred writings is called אֶפֶס, apha, is no doubt the epha of the Arabs, thus described by Dr Shaw: but the most common as well as malignant of this tribe, is the leffah, which, like our viper or adder, is of a less uniform turn of body than the zurrike, and rarely exceeds a foot in length. It is not always of the same colour, but varies a little according to the quality of the earth, sand, or rocks where it is found. The terriola dipsas answers very well both to the name and to the quality of the leffah, which is so called from leffah, urere, 'to burn.' The Arabs report that there is the same antipathy betwixt the leffah and the taifah, chameleon, which was long ago assigned to the chameleon and the viper; and that a little drop of clammy juice, which the taifah lets fall on the leffah will throw it into such violent convulsions as are attended with immediate death. This creature is remarkable for its quick and penetrating poison, and on this account has been made, from the remotest antiquity, an emblem of what is hurtful and destructive. Nay, so terrible was the nature of these creatures, that they were very commonly thought to be sent as executioners of divine vengeance upon mankind for enormous crimes which had escaped the course of justice. An instance of such an opinion as this, we have in the history of St Paul (Acts xxviii.), whom the people of Melita, when they saw the viper leap upon his hand, presently concluded to be a murderer; and as readily made a god of him, when, instead of having his hand inflamed, or falling down dead, he, without any harm, shook the reptile into the fire, it being obvious enough to imagine, that he must stand in a near relation, at least to the gods themselves, who could thus command the messengers of their vengeance, and counterwork the effects of such powerful agents.—Carpenter's Scripture Natural History.

c Hercules was one of the gods whom the people of this island worshipped, and to him they ascribed the power of curing the bite of serpents.—Beausobre's Annotations.

d That he was governor of the island, is highly probable from an inscription found there, and set down by Grotius, wherein the ἩΡΩΤΟΣ ΜΕΛΙΤΑΙΩΝ, is reckoned among the Roman officers; and that both he, and most of the people under him, were converted to the Christian faith, is the joint opinion of St Chrysostom, and some other Greek authors; whereas Ado, with several Latin writers, affirm that Publius, joining himself to St Paul, was by him made a bishop, and sent to preach the gospel; and that coming to Athens, he there settled, governed that church in the quality of a bishop for some time, and then ended his life by martyrdom. But this is a mistaken piece of history, since the Publius who was the bishop of Athens did not suffer martyrdom till the time of Marcus Aurelius.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles, and Calnet's Commentary.

After three months stay in this island, the centurion and his charge went on board the e Castor and Pollux, a ers of divine vengeance upon mankind for enormous crimes which had escaped the course of justice. An instance of such an opinion as this, we have in the history of St Paul (Acts xxviii.), whom the people of Melita, when they saw the viper leap upon his hand, presently concluded to be a murderer; and as readily made a god of him, when, instead of having his hand inflamed, or falling down dead, he, without any harm, shook the reptile into the fire, it being obvious enough to imagine, that he must stand in a near relation, at least to the gods themselves, who could thus command the messengers of their vengeance, and counterwork the effects of such powerful agents.—Carpenter's Scripture Natural History.

e Hercules was one of the gods whom the people of this island worshipped, and to him they ascribed the power of curing the bite of serpents.—Beausobre's Annotations.

d That he was governor of the island, is highly probable from an inscription found there, and set down by Grotius, wherein the ἩΡΩΤΟΣ ΜΕΛΙΤΑΙΩΝ, is reckoned among the Roman officers; and that both he, and most of the people under him, were converted to the Christian faith, is the joint opinion of St Chrysostom, and some other Greek authors; whereas Ado, with several Latin writers, affirm that Publius, joining himself to St Paul, was by him made a bishop, and sent to preach the gospel; and that coming to Athens, he there settled, governed that church in the quality of a bishop for some time, and then ended his life by martyrdom. But this is a mistaken piece of history, since the Publius who was the bishop of Athens did not suffer martyrdom till the time of Marcus Aurelius.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles, and Calnet's Commentary.

e It was the custom of the ancients to have images on their ships, both at the head and stern, the first of which was called παρασημιον, 'the sign,' from which the ship was named, and the other was that of the tutelar deity to whose care the ship was committed; which probably might give occasion to the fable that Europa was carried away by Jupiter in the shape of a bull. There is no doubt but they had sometimes deities at the head; and then it is most likely, if they had any figure at the stern, it was the same, as it is hardly probable the ship should be called by the name of one deity, and be committed to the care of another. The figure that was used for Castor and Pollux, as Dr Lightfoot says, was that of two young men on horseback, with each of them a javelin in his hand, &c. But others have observed that the sign of Castor and Pollux was that of a double cross; and though the Greeks took them for a sign in the zodiac which was called the twins, and considered as sacred to those fictitious deities, whom they supposed to be the sons of Jupiter by Leda, it was not at first represented by two boys, but by two beasts, as referring to the fruitfulness of goats in producing twin kids about the time the sun was in that constellation. The appearance of both these constellations together was, as Dr Hammond has observed, after Strabo, Pausanias, and other ancient ship of Alexandria, bound for Italy. At a Syracuse they put in and tarried three days; thence sailed to b Rhegium, and so to c Puteoli, where they landed; and finding some Christians there, at their request staid a week with them, and then set forward in their journey to Rome. The Christians of this city hearing of the apostle's coming, went out to meet him, some as far as d Appii-forum, and others as far as the e Three Taverns; writers, thought favourable to mariners, and therefore for a good omen, they had them carved or painted on the head of the ship, and gave it a name from hence, which the sacred historian does not scruple to use.—Doddridge's Expositor.

A. M. 4065. A. D. 61; OR, A. M. 5472. A. D. 61, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

a This was a city of Sicily, seated on the east side of the island, with a fine prospect from every entrance both by sea and land. Its port, which had the sea on both sides of it, was almost all of it environed with beautiful buildings, and all that part of it which was without the city, was on both sides banked up, and sustained with very fair walls of marble. The city itself while in its splendour, was the largest and richest that the Greeks possessed in any part of the world. For according to Strabo it was two and twenty miles in circumference; and both Livy and Plutarch inform us, that the spoil of it was equal to that of Carthage. It was called Quadruplex, as being divided into four parts,—Acradina, Tyche, Neapolis, and the island of Octygia. The first of these contained in it the famous temple of Jupiter; the second, the temple of Fortune; the third, a large amphitheatre, and a wonderful statue of Apollo in the midst of a spacious square; and the fourth, the two temples of Diana and Minerva, and the renowned fountain of Arethusa. About two hundred and ten years before the birth of Christ, this city was taken and sacked by Marellus the Roman general; and in storming the place, Archimedes the great mathematician, who is esteemed the first inventor of the sphere, and who, during the siege, had sorely galled the Romans with his military engines, was slain by a common soldier, while he was intent upon his studies. After it was thus destroyed by Marellus, Augustus rebuilt that part of it which stood upon the island; and in time it so far recovered itself, as to have three walls, three castles, and a marble gate, and to be able to set out twelve thousand horse, and four hundred ships. But the blow which the Saracens gave it, A. D. 884, when they razed it to the ground, it even feels to this day.—Whitby's Alphabetical Table, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

b Rhegium, now called Reggio, is a port town in Italy, opposite to Messina in Sicily; and is thought to have had this name given it by the Greeks, who suppose that much about this place Sicily was broken off from the continent of Italy by the sea. At present it is an archbishop's see, and a considerable place for trade, though it has several times formerly been surprised and plundered by the Turks.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

c This place, which is now commonly called Pozzuoli, is a city in Terra di Lavoro, a province in the kingdom of Naples, situated upon a hill, in a creek of the sea, and just opposite to Baia, on the other side of the creek, a place of great renown among the Roman writers. Within the bounds of this city there are five and thirty natural baths of different sorts of warm waters, very useful for the cure of several diseases; and from these baths, or pits of water, called in Latin, putei, the town is said to have taken its name. At present it is a bishop's see, under the archbishop of Naples; and in it are to be seen many Roman antiquities, and natural rarities, not easily to be found elsewhere.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

d This place, at present called Cassarilla di St Maria, was an ancient city of the Volsci, about fifty miles distant from Rome; and is probably thought to have had its name from the statue of Appius Claudius, that Roman consul who paved the famous way from Rome to Capua, which was set up here.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament, and Calmel's Commentary.

e This was another place that stood upon the Appian way, about thirty miles distant from Rome. And that it was a city, properly so called, and not a parcel of inns only for the reception and entertainment of travellers, is evident from its being an episcopal see in the time of Constantine; for among the nineteen bishops who were delegated by that Emperor to decide the controversy between Donatus and Cereilianus, Felix a Tribus Tabernis, which when he saw, he blessed God and took courage. They all conducted him, in a kind of triumph, into the city; where, when they were arrived, the rest of the prisoners were delivered over to the f captain of the guard, but Paul was permitted to stay in a private house, only g with one soldier for his ward.

Three days after his arrival at Rome, St Paul sent for the heads of the Jewish h consistory there, and to them related the cause of his coming, namely, 'That though he had been guilty of no violation of the laws of their religion, yet by the Jews at Jerusalem he had been delivered into the hands of the Roman governors, who more than once would have acquitted him, as innocent of any capital offence, but that, by the perverseness of his persecutors, he was constrained, not with any intention to accuse his own nation, but only to clear and vindicate himself, to make his appeal to the Emperor.' Having thus removed a popular prejudice, and insinuated the cause of his suffering to be that which their own religion had taught him, namely, the belief and expectation of a future resurrection, he gained so far upon their affections, as to have a second conference, by their own appointment, for explaining the principles of Christianity to them. Accordingly, when they were met together, he discoursed to them, from morning to night, concerning the religion and doctrine of the holy Jesus, proving from the promises and predictions of the Old Testament that he was the true Messias. But the success of his discourse was different, some being convinced, and others persisting in their infidelity; so that they parted with no small difference and disagreement among themselves.

For two whole years Paul dwelt at Rome, in a house which he hired for his own use, wherein he constantly employed himself in preaching, and writing for the good nis, Felix bishop of the city, called Tres Taberna, was one. And indeed, if we will allow of Scaliger's interpretation of the word taberna, namely, that it was the name of the frontier towns, which were built against the excursions of the barbarians: Zosimus (Hist. b. ii. part 65.) acquaints us, that Dioclesian everywhere erected such on the borders of the Roman empire; and we have reason to think, that the like was done in earlier times by other emperors; and that therefore the Tres Taberna, where the Sauromatae, as Ausonius tells us, had their habitation assigned them, in order to garrison and defend these places, were such.—Hammond's Annotations.

f This στρατοπύδαρχος, or chief commander of the Emperor's guards, is generally supposed to have been Burrhus, whom Claudius made his praetorian prefect, A. D. 51. He had a great hand in advancing Nero to the empire; and, while he lived, had so much influence or authority over him, as to keep his evil inclinations under some sort of restraint; but he died A. D. 62, about two years after St Paul's arrival at Rome, leaving behind him, according to the account of historians, a great reputation for wisdom and moderation.—Echard's Ecclesiastical History, and Calmel's Commentary.

g The manner of the soldiers guarding the prisoner among the Romans was, by having a chain, at one end fastened to the prisoner's right hand, and at the other to the soldier's left, and this made so long, that they might conveniently go together. But sometimes, for greater security, the prisoner was guarded with two soldiers, and so had two chains, one of them made fast to one soldier, and the other to the other; (Acts xii. 6, 7. and Acts xxi. 33.)—Whitby's and Hammond's Annotations.

h Hence it appears, that the edict of Claudius, which banished the Jews from Rome, was of no long continuance, but probably expired with his life; because we find, by St Paul's epistle to the Romans, which he wrote about two years before his going among them, that there were great numbers both of Jews and Christians then residing at Rome.—Beausobre's Annotations and Calmel's Commentary.

A. M. 4066. A. D. 62; OR, A. M. 5473. A. D. 62, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

of the church. He preached daily without interruption, and with good success, insomuch that his imprisonment very much redounded to the propagation of the gospel, and made him famous even in the a emperor's court, where he converted several to Christianity.

Among other of the apostle's converts at Rome, was one b Onesimus, who had formerly been a servant to Philemon, c a person of distinction d in Colosse but had a Among these the Roman martyrology reckons Terpes, an officer of prime note in Nero's palace, and afterwards a martyr for the faith: and St Chrysostom, if Baronius cites him right, tells us of Nero's cup-bearer, and one of his concubines, supposed by some to have been Poppea Sabina, of whom Tacitus gives us this character,—‘That she wanted nothing to make her one of the most accomplished ladies in the world, but a chaste and virtuous mind.’ And I know not how far it may seem to countenance her conversion, at least inclination to a better religion than that of paganism, that Josephus styles her a pious woman, and tells us, that she effectually solicited the cause of the Jews with her husband Nero; and what favours Josephus himself received from her at Rome, he relates in his own life.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

b This was no uncommon name given to slaves; and as it signifies in the original ‘profitable,’ the apostle may be supposed to allude to it, when he tells Philemon, concerning this servant of his, ‘in time past he was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable both to thee and me,’ (Phil. ver. 11.) and indeed so he proved; for, not long after his return to his master, he was sent back again to Rome, that he might be of service to St Paul in his prison. The epistles which St Paul wrote in his confinement, were by his hand conveyed to their respective churches. After the apostle's release from prison, he was assistant to him in the propagation of the gospel, and according to the Apostolic Constitutions, was by him made bishop of Berea in Macedonia, where he suffered martyrdom; though others say, that he succeeded Timothy in the bishopric of Ephesus; and that, being taken into custody, and carried to Rome, he was there stoned to death for his faith in Jesus Christ. That he was a true convert to Christianity, and a sincere penitent for his private offences, is evident from the appellations which St Paul gives him, of ‘his son, the son of his bowels,’ (Phil. 10, 12.) and, ‘his faithful and beloved brother,’ (Col. iv. 9.) But that he was either bishop or martyr, St Chrysostom, St Jerom, and Theodoret, who have all wrote commentaries upon the epistle to Philemon, make not the least mention.—Calmet's and Beausobre's Preface to the Epistle of Philemon.

c He was a person of some consideration in Colosse, a city of Phrygia; for his family was there remaining in the time of Theodoret, who flourished in the fifth age of the church. St Paul, we read, was twice in Phrygia; and yet we do not find that he was ever at Colosse; nay, he seems to declare himself that he was never there, (Col. ii. 1.) and therefore we must suppose, that either he converted Philemon, as he seems to intimate he did, (ver. 19.) at Ephesus, or some other place in Asia Minor, while he was preaching the gospel there; or that Epaphras, who was St Paul's disciple, and by him appointed evangelist to the Colossians, was the person who converted him. However this be, it is certain, that, upon his conversion, he became a fellow-labourer in the gospel, (ver. 1.) and, as the Apostolic Constitutions tell us, by St Paul was made the bishop of the church of Colosse, which, by his extensive charity, (Philem. 5, 6.) he edified, as much as by his preaching of the gospel, until he and his wife Appia both suffered martyrdom in the time of Nero.—Calmet's and Beausobre's Preface to the Epistle of Philemon.—See also Horne's Introduction, vol. iv.—Ed.

d This was a great city of Phrygia in Asia Minor, built by the river Lycus, near the place, as Herodotus informs us, (i. 7. c. 30.) where it begins to run under ground, as it does for five furlongs before it rises again, and empties itself into the Meander. This city was situated at an equal distance between Laodicea and Hierapolis, and therefore we find St Paul, in his epistle to the Colossians, (chap. iv. 13.) making mention of the inhabitants of all these three cities together; which, according to the account of Eusebius, were all destroyed by an earthquake, in the tenth of Nero, about two years after that this epistle was sent to them.—Wall's Geography of the New Testament, and Whitby's Alphabetical Table.

run away from his master, and taken things of some value with him. He rambled as far as Rome; where, by St Paul's means, he was converted, instructed, and baptized, and afterwards became highly serviceable to him in his imprisonment. But being another man's servant, he sent him back to Colosse, and, at the same time, wrote e a short letter to his master, f earnestly desiring him to pardon him, and, notwithstanding his former faults, to treat him kindly, and use him as a brother; and promising withal, that if he had wronged or owed him any thing, he himself would not fail to repay it.

The Christians of Philippi having heard of St Paul's imprisonment at Rome, and not knowing what straits he might be reduced to, raised a contribution for him, and sent it by Epaphroditus, g their bishop; by whom he returned an epistle h to them; wherein he gives some e This epistle may pass for a masterpiece of eloquence in the persuasive way. For therein the apostle has recourse to all the considerations which friendship, religion, piety, and tenderness can inspire to reconcile a servant to his master; and yet some of the ancients were of opinion, that it did not deserve a place in the canon of scripture: because it was written on a particular occasion, and with a design not so much to instruct Christians in general, as to recommend a fugitive servant. But though the subject of this epistle be a private affair, yet it contains such general instructions as these: 1st. That no Christian, though of the meanest condition, is to be contemned. 2dly. That Christianity does not impair the power of masters over their servants. 3dly. That servants ought to make satisfaction for any wrong or injury done to their masters. 4thly. That masters ought to be reconciled to their servants, upon their repentance, and acknowledgement of their faults. And 5thly, That there is, at all times, a love and affection due from a master to a profitable servant. And who then, say the Greek interpreters, would refuse to number an epistle so profitable and instructive with the rest of St Paul's works.—Chrysost. argum. epist. ad Philem.—Calmet's, Beausobre's, and Whitby's pref. ad eandem.

f For the case of servants in those days was very hard. All masters were looked upon, not only by the Roman laws, but by the laws of all nations, as having an unlimited power over them; so that, without asking the magistrate's leave, or any public or formal trial, they might adjudge them to any work or punishment, even to the loss of life itself, if they pleased. The exorbitancy of this power however was, in some measure, curbed by the laws of succeeding emperors, especially after they became Christian, which make better provision for persons in that relation and capacity, and in case of unjust and over-rogious usage, enable them to appeal to a more righteous tribunal, where master and servant shall both stand upon even ground, ‘where he that doth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons,’ (Col. iii. 25.)—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

g St Paul calls him the ‘apostle of the Philippians;’ which some, taking the word apostle in its literal sense, for a messenger only, do suppose that Epaphroditus is so called, because he was appointed by the Philippians to carry money to St Paul, who was then in prison at Rome, and, in their name, to be serviceable to him in his person. But Theodoret, and others of the fathers who have written upon the epistle to the Philippians, tell us, that he was the person ὃ τῶν ψυχῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιστάτης ἐπιμέλεια, ‘to whom the care of their souls had been committed,’ and consequently their bishop; for it is more feasible to make him bishop of Philippi, than of any other place, as some have done.—Whitby's Preface to the epistle to the Philippians, and Calmet's Commentary on chap. ii. 25.

h Of all the epistles which St Paul wrote, there is none so full of affection and tender sentiments, as this to the Philippians, who it must be owned, upon the account of their constancy in the faith, as well as their zeal for the apostle, and concern for his sufferings, deserved such kind treatment; and therefore, so far is he from censuring or reproving them, as he usually does other churches, that we find him abounding in their praise and commendation: a good argument this, as St Chrysostom remarks, of their virtuous behaviour; that they gave their teacher no cause to complain, but that the whole epistle which he sent account of the state of his affairs at Rome : gratefully acknowledges their kindness to him ; warns them against the dangerous opinions which the Judaizing teachers began to vent among them ; and advises them to live in continual obedience to Christ, to avoid disputations, to delight in prayer, to be courageous under afflictions, united in love, and clothed with humility, in imitation of the blessed Jesus, ' who so far humbled himself, as to become obedient to death, even to the death of the cross.'

A. M. 4066. A. D. 62; OR. A. M. 5473. A. D. 62, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

St Paul had for three years lived at Ephesus, taking great pains in preaching the gospel, and was thoroughly acquainted with the state and condition of the place ; and therefore now taking the opportunity of Tychicus's ^a going thither, he wrote his epistle ^b to the Ephesians ; ' wherein he endeavours to countermine the principles and practices both of the Jews and Gentiles ; to confirm them in the belief and obedience of the Christian doctrine ; and to instruct them fully in the great mysteries of the gospel ; their redemption and justification by the death of Christ ; their gratuitous election ; the calling of the Gentiles ; their union with the Jews in one body, of which Jesus was the head ; and the glorious exaltation of that head above all creatures, both spiritual and temporal ; together with many excellent moral precepts, them, contains nothing but kind exhortations and encouragements, without the least mixture of sharpness or reproof.—Beausobre's Preface to Epistle to the Philippians.

^a Tychicus was of the province of Asia, and a disciple of St Paul, whom he frequently employed to carry his letters to several churches ; as that to the Colossians, written in 61 ; that to the Ephesians, written in 65 ; and the first to Timothy, written in 64. Nor did he employ him merely to carry his letters, but to learn likewise the state of the several churches to which he sent him, and to bring him proper intelligence from thence : and for this reason he calls him his ' dear brother, a faithful minister in the Lord, and his companion in the service of God,' (Eph. vi. 21, 22. and Col. iv. 7, 8.) For this reason he had once thoughts of sending him to Crete, to preside over that church in the absence of Titus, (chap. iii. 12.) as it is probably supposed that when he sent him with his letter to Ephesus, he ordered him to abide there, and to govern that church, while Timothy, their proper bishop, was absent with him at Rome. But when St Paul was restored to his liberty, whether this disciple of his attended him in his travels, or was constituted bishop of Colophon in the province of Asia, as some report, we have no account that may be depended upon.—Calnet's Dictionary, under the word.

^b The heretic Marcion, as Tertullian (adv. Mar. b. 7. c. 17.) informs us, pretended that this epistle was not written to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans, for which he produces his own copy, inscribed ' to the saints which were at Laodicea,' and not at Ephesus, as the generality of manuscripts and versions now have it ; and to support this, several passages are cited out of the epistle itself, which seem not so well to agree with the circumstances of St Paul, who had lived and preached for the space of three years at Ephesus, (vide c. i. 15. iii. 1. iv. 21.) But as it would be rash and imprudent upon the account of a few ambiguous texts, to deny the authority of all antiquity, and especially that of St Ignatius, who, in his letter to the Ephesians, (sect. 12.) makes mention of that which St Paul had wrote to them : so if we are minded to compromise the matter we may, with archbishop Usher, say, that this was a circular letter ; and designed for the use of all the churches of Asia, inasmuch that St Paul did not insert the name of any particular church, but sent it with this general title, ' Paul, the apostle of Jesus Christ, to the saints which are at ———.' But then as Ephesus was the metropolis of the province, the epistle, in most of the copies, went under its name ; though others there might be, even as late as St Basil's days, inscribed to no church at all ; from whence the Laodiceans might pretend, that it belonged originally to them ; and Marcion, who was of the kingdom of Pontus, in the confines of Phrygia, wherein Laodicea was, might accordingly cite it under their name.—Calnet's and Beausobre's Preface to the Epistle to the Ephesians.

both as to the general duties of religion, and the duties of their particular relations.'

St Paul himself had never been at Colosse ; but Epaphras, ^c who was then at Rome a prisoner with him, had preached the gospel there with good success ; and from him he might learn, that certain false teachers had endeavoured to persuade the people, that they ought not to apply to God by Jesus Christ, who, since his ascension, was so far exalted above them, but by angels, who were now become the proper mediators between God and men ; and therefore, in opposition to this, as well as some other seductions of the like nature, he wrote his epistle to the Colossians : ^d wherein he magnificently sets forth the ^c While St Paul was preaching in Phrygia, whereof Colosse was one of the principal cities, he very likely met with this Epaphras ; but when, where or upon what occasion, he converted him from the heathen to the Christian religion, we no where find. This only we know, that after his own conversion, he contributed very much to that of his fellow-citizens, the inhabitants of Colosse, and that while St Paul was in bonds at Rome, coming very probably to pay him a visit, himself was likewise made prisoner with him for the common cause of Christianity, (Philem. ver. 23.) Understanding, however, that false teachers, taking the advantage of his absence, had sown tares among the wheat, he engaged St Paul, whose name and authority were revered through all Phrygia, to send a letter to the Colossians, in order to set them right in matters wherein they were mistaken, and to give them a true knowledge of their false teachers. This the apostle very readily did ; and the more to recommend the merit and support the authority of Epaphras, styles him ' his dear fellow servant, and faithful minister of Christ,' (Col. i. 7.) being then, as it is said of him, a bishop and, long after, a martyr at Colosse.—Calnet's Commentary.

^d The better to understand the chief design of this epistle, we may observe, that the followers of Plato always looked upon angels, whom they honoured with the name of ' demons,' as the great mediators between God and men, who carried up their prayers to him, and re-conveyed his blessings to them. To these they committed, not only the direction of the stars and elements, but the administration likewise of all sublunary things ; and from thence they concluded, that they were to be honoured, for the same reason that we usually do honour the governors of provinces, or the chief ministers of any state. The followers of Simon Magus ascribed the creation of the world even to the meanest kind of angels, but those of a superior order they held in the highest veneration : for their master, who, according to his fancy, had stocked the heavens with these intelligencies, made it one of his principles, that none could be saved without using such and such mysteries, and sacrificing to the God of all things by the mediation of these celestial powers. Nay the Jews themselves, after their return from the Babylonish captivity, began to entertain high conceptions of the angels, inasmuch that in the prophecy of Daniel, and other books written after that captivity, we find the several orders of them ranged under their proper names ; and among them there was a famous sect, called the Essenes, who, together with other things, obliged themselves to preserve the books which were peculiar to them, and the names of the angels which they held in great esteem. It is to be observed further, that among the Jews there were several sects very superstitious in their abstinences : that the Essenes denied themselves the use of wine ; the Nazarenes held it a crime to eat flesh ; and the Therapæute would drink nothing but water, and made bread and salt their common food, except some more delicate persons, as they called them, who used honey and hyssop. From all which it seems very probable that the Essenes, who were reputed the philosophers of the Jews, or some other sects of the like nature, having embraced the Christian religion, were for engaging others in the worship of angels, the observation of the Jewish ceremonies, and some particular abstinences, wherein they placed a great deal of perfection. For though this doctrine of worshipping angels might originally be derived from the Platonists, yet since they who at this time held it added some Jewish observances, they are rather to be reckoned among the scholars of Simon Magus, or of some opinionated Jews, who were for mixing the law and the gospel together ; and these were the heretics whom St Paul in his epistle, sets himself to oppose.—Beausobre's Preface to the Epistle to the Colossians.

A. M. 4966. A. D. 62; OR. A. M. 5473. A. D. 62, Sc. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

Messiah, and all the benefits flowing from him, as being the image of his Father, the Redeemer of all mankind, the reconciler of all things to God, and the head of the church, which gives life and vigour to all its members; wherein he commends the doctrine preached to them by Epaphras, and exhorts them not to be led away by the reasonings of human philosophy, by the superstitious practices of making differences of meats and drinks, or by a pretended humility, in worshipping angels; and wherein he gives them an abstract of many chief and principal duties of the Christian life, especially such as respect the relations of husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants.^a

While St Paul was thus laudably employed in his confinement at Rome, James, the bishop of Jerusalem, was not idle; but thinking it belonged to his apostolical office to take care of all the converted among the twelve tribes of Israel, wherever dispersed, he wrote an epistle to them, which, among those that are called a Catholic, is placed first in the sacred canon, and was designed 'to suppress and confute a dangerous error, then growing up in the church, namely, that a bare naked faith was sufficient to secure men's salvation, without any attention to good works; and to comfort Christians under the persecutions which were going to be raised against them b by worldly a Ever since the fourth century, this epistle of St James, the two of St Peter, three of St John, and that of St Jude, have obtained the name of Catholic, because they are directed to all the faithful, and not to any particular church, as those of St Paul are. And this may suggest a reason why this epistle of St James, in particular, did not at first meet with a general reception. For, being in the nature of a circular letter, and addressed to no one church, who might take care to preserve it, and promote its pretensions, it might be some time before it obtained its place in the canon; and that the rather, because there seemed to be some contradiction between the doctrine advanced in it, namely, 'that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only, (chap. ii. 24.), and that in St Paul's epistle to the Romans, 'that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law, (chap. iii. 28.) which might give some unskillful readers, not sufficiently attentive to the scope of each apostle, some umbrage of suspicion.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Preface to the Epistle of St James.

Calder's Preface to Epistle to the Col. and Echar'd's Ecclesiastical History, b. ii. c. 6.

b From the History of the Acts we learn, that, about the 39th year of Christ, the 'churches had peace throughout all Judea, Galilee, and Samaria,' (chap. ix. 31.), and so they seem to have continued, till after the council of Jerusalem, when they are said to 'be established in faith, and to increase in numbers daily,' (Acts xvi. 5.) Nay, when St Paul was at Rome, 'he received all that came unto him,' for two whole years, 'preaching the kingdom of God, with all confidence, no man forbidding him,' (Acts xxviii. 30, 31.) So that at least, till the 4th or 5th year of Nero, the gospel was freely preached at Rome, without any opposition either from the Romans or the Jews. But then, in the 6th year of this emperor's reign, the Christians were subjected to punishments, (as Suetonius in Neron. c. 16. tells us;) and it seems very probable, says Dr Lightfoot, that even then Nero had, by some public act or edict, suppressed Christianity, not only at Rome, but also in Judea, as he gathers from that passage in Tacitus, 'The destructive superstition having been suppressed for a season, again broke forth, not only throughout Judea, the cradle of the evil, but even throughout the whole city;' which shows, that before the persecution began in the 10th of Nero, of which Tacitus here speaks, Christianity had been by him suppressed, not at Rome only, but in Judea. In the 10th of his reign he renewed his persecution of the Christians; and thus he did not only at Rome, but through all the provinces of his empire; which encouraged the Jews every where to show their utmost rage against all those of their religion who had embraced the faith of Christ, and the nearer they drew to their final dissolution, the more did Satan inflame their rage and malice against those Christians, whom he found to be the fatal enemies and overthrowers of his kingdom.—Whitby's Preface to the Epistle of St James.

c The words of Josephus are these:—'This was so surprising a way of proceeding to all the honest and conscientious part of the city, that they presently sent king Agrippa private notice of it, as a very ill thing done, with a request that Ananas might have a check for it, and a caution never to do any such thing for the future; whilst others were sent with an account of it to Albinus, who was then upon his journey to Alexandria, representing it as an usurpation, and encroachment upon his authority; and what ought not to have been done without his consent. Whereupon the governor sent him an angry and menacing letter; and king Agrippa, at the end of three months, removed him from his office of high-priest, and gave it to Jesus the son of Damnaus.'—Antiquities, b. xx. c. 8.

d He was a man of extraordinary piety and devotion, educated under the strictest rules of religion, and a priest, as some imagine, of the order of the Rechabites, or rather, as Epiphanius conjectures, of the most ancient form of priesthood, when the sacerdotal office was the prerogative of the first-born; and therefore it is said, that he wore a plate of gold, or probably a mitre, upon his head, as the ensign of his dignity. Prayer was his daily business and delight: so constant was he at his devotions, that his knees became hard and callous as a camel's, and so prevalent in his petitions to Heaven, that in time of great drought he prayed for rain, and obtained it. Nor was his piety towards God more remarkable than his charity, his humility, his temperance, and universal goodness, which made him the love and against those Christians, whom he found to be the fatal enemies and overthrowers of his kingdom.—Whitby's Preface to the Epistle of St James.

c The words of Josephus are these:—'This was so surprising a way of proceeding to all the honest and conscientious part of the city, that they presently sent king Agrippa private notice of it, as a very ill thing done, with a request that Ananas might have a check for it, and a caution never to do any such thing for the future; whilst others were sent with an account of it to Albinus, who was then upon his journey to Alexandria, representing it as an usurpation, and encroachment upon his authority; and what ought not to have been done without his consent. Whereupon the governor sent him an angry and menacing letter; and king Agrippa, at the end of three months, removed him from his office of high-priest, and gave it to Jesus the son of Damnaus.'—Antiquities, b. xx. c. 8.

d He was a man of extraordinary piety and devotion, educated under the strictest rules of religion, and a priest, as some imagine, of the order of the Rechabites, or rather, as Epiphanius conjectures, of the most ancient form of priesthood, when the sacerdotal office was the prerogative of the first-born; and therefore it is said, that he wore a plate of gold, or probably a mitre, upon his head, as the ensign of his dignity. Prayer was his daily business and delight: so constant was he at his devotions, that his knees became hard and callous as a camel's, and so prevalent in his petitions to Heaven, that in time of great drought he prayed for rain, and obtained it. Nor was his piety towards God more remarkable than his charity, his humility, his temperance, and universal goodness, which made him the love and buried in a tomb of his own building on Mount Olivet, and, by the general voice, his own brother Simon was appointed his successor in the bishopric of Jerusalem.

A. M. 4067. A. D. 63; OR, A. M. 5474. A. D. 63, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

By what means St Paul was delivered from his imprisonment, and discharged from the accusation which the Jews brought against him, we have no account in history; but may presume, that having not sufficient proof of what they alleged, or being informed, that what they alleged was no violation of any Roman law, they durst not implead him before the emperor, and so permitted him to be discharged in course. But before he left Italy, he wrote his famous and most elaborate a epistle to the Hebrews, that is, to the converted Jews dwelling in Jer-wonder of the age, and gained him the character and title of 'James the Just,' or, as it is in the Syriac, of Oblias, that is, 'the defence and fortress of the people,' as if the safety and happiness of the whole nation depended upon his prayers and interest with Heaven. In short, he was the delight of all good men, and so much in the favour and estimation of the people, that they used to flock after him, and strive who should touch, though it were but the hem of his garment. Nor was he only loved and honoured by his friends, but held in great veneration by his enemies, inasmuch that some of the wisest of them looked upon his martyrdom as an inlet to all those miseries and calamities which soon after flowed upon them.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

a That this epistle was of an ancient date, and written before the destruction of the temple, and abolition of the Jewish worship, is manifest from the author's making no mention of these events, which, had they been passed, he would not have omitted, as being one of the best arguments that could be produced for the support of his main doctrine, the abrogation of the Levitical sacrifices and priesthood; nor could we find it quoted so frequently in St Clement's letter to the Corinthians, which seems to have been wrote before the downfall of Jerusalem, had it not been of a date prior to that time. It is not to be questioned, then, but that this epistle to the Hebrews was extant in the apostolic age. But who its author was, we find both ancients and moderns in great dispute. Some ascribe it to St Barnabas, others to Clemens Romanus, others to St Luke, and others again to Apollos, who, in the sacred history, is styled 'an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures,' (Acts xviii. 24.) If, however, we look into the epistle itself, we shall find, that the character can agree with none so well as St Paul: for as it appears that this epistle was in being before the destruction of Jerusalem, and while the Jews had power enough to oppress the Christians in Judea; that the person who wrote it was well versed in the scriptures of the Old Testament, and the most abstruse parts of Jewish theology; that he represents himself as lately in prison, but at that time set at liberty, and hoping speedily to come and see them; that he mentions Timothy, whom he calls his 'brother,' as being likewise released, and ready to accompany him in his journey, (Heb. xiii. 23.) that he commends those to whom he writes, for 'having had compassion of him in his bonds, and taking joyfully the spoiling of their goods,' (chap. x. 34.) that he requests them to pray for him, that he might be restored to them sooner, (chap. xiii. 18, 19.) and, lastly, that this epistle was written from Rome, as some manuscripts have it, or from Italy, as we find it in others; we cannot but allow, that each of these is a strong argument that this epistle was written by St Paul, because they accord so exactly with his circumstances at this time above any one's else. But then, if we add to this the testimony of the ancients, especially of St Peter, who, in his second epistle to the Jewish converts, mentions a certain letter which St Paul had wrote to them, distinct from all his other epistolary writings, (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.) and can be no other than that which bears the name of the Epistle to the Hebrews, we can no longer doubt of its being the composition of St Paul, and an original composition too, since it has in it none of that constraint which is visible in a translation, nor any of those Hebrew phrases which occur so frequently in the version of the Septuagint.—Beausobre's and Whitby's Preface to the Epistle to the Hebrews.—It is now, by universal consent, attributed to St Paul; for the arguments at length, the inquiring reader may consult Professor Stuart on the Hebrews, Horne's Introduction, Blewfield's Greek Test., and Macknight on the Epistles.—Ed.

usalem and Judea: 'wherein his main design is, to magnify Christ and the religion of the gospel, above Moses and the Jewish œconomy, that, by this means, he may the better establish the converted Jews in the belief and profession of Christianity: wherein, to this purpose, he represents our Saviour, in his divine nature, far superior to all angels and all created beings; and, in his mediatorial capacity, a greater lawgiver than Moses, a greater priest than Aaron, and a greater king and priest than Melchisedec: wherein he shows, that the ceremonies, the sacrifices, and the observances of the law could have no virtue in themselves, but only as they were types of Jesus Christ; and being now accomplished in his person, and by his ministry, were finally and totally abolished: wherein he insists upon the necessity of faith, and, by the examples of the patriarchs and prophets, proves, that justification is to be had no other way than by the merits of a dying Saviour: and wherein, lastly, he mingles many excellent precepts for the regulation of their lives, exhortations to trust and confidence in Christ in all their sufferings, and strict cautions against apostasy from his religion in the hottest persecutions.'

Having thus discharged his ministry, both by preaching and writing, in Italy, St Paul, in company with Timothy, prosecuted his long-intended journey into Spain, and it is probably thought, that from thence he came over and b preached the gospel in Britain. After he had continued about eight or nine months in these western parts, he returned again east-ward, and leaving both Sicily and Greece, arrived at Crete, where he constituted Titus bishop of the island, and then went with Timothy into Judea, to visit the Christians there.

In what manner St Peter employed his time, after his escape out of prison, we have no certain account; but it is generally agreed, that about the second year of the b Though we may feel almost certain that Paul would visit Jerusalem, after his release from Rome, we are still at a loss to account for his proceedings during the remainder of his life; and yet this period was, perhaps, as interesting as any part of the former years which he had devoted to the service of the gospel. We have traced his progress through the most civilized portions of the world, and even to the capital of the Roman empire; but he professed himself also under an obligation to preach the gospel to nations that were rude and barbarous. He had ample time for fulfilling this sacred duty; and tradition has pointed out the west of Europe as the scene of these latter actions of his life. Spain and Gaul, and even Britain, have claimed the great apostle as the first founder of their respective churches; but the writer of history is obliged to add, that though such journeys were perfectly possible, and even probable, the actual evidence of their having been undertaken is extremely small. We have the apostle's own testimony for his intending to visit Spain: and Clement, one of his own fellow-labourers, in an epistle which he wrote before the end of the century, speaks of Paul having gone to the extremity of the west. This may, perhaps, give some support to the notion of his visiting Spain; and if he went to that country by land, he must have passed through the south of France. But the churches in France which claim the earliest origin, trace their foundation rather to the companions of Paul than to the apostle himself; and there is nothing unreasonable in supposing that France, as well as Spain, contained converts to Christianity before the end of the first century. The same may, perhaps, be said of our own island, though we need not believe the traditions which have been already mentioned, concerning its first conversion; and it is right to add, that the earliest writer who speaks of Britain as being visited by any of the apostles, is Eusebius, who wrote at the beginning of the fourth century; and the earliest writer who names St Paul, is Theodoret, who lived a century later.—Burton's History of the Church.—Ed.

A. M. 4067. A. D. 63; OR, A. M. 5474. A. D. 63, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

emperor Claudius, he went to Rome, and there continued, until that emperor, taking the advantage of some seditions and tumults raised by the Jews, or by a public edict, banished them from Rome. Upon this occasion St Peter returned back to Jerusalem, and was present at the great apostolic synod, whereof we have given some account before. How he disposed of himself after this, we are left under great uncertainties, though the current opinion is, that, after he had visited the several churches which he had planted in the east, and carried the glad tidings of the gospel into Africa, Sicily, Italy, and even as far as Britain, making great numbers of converts in all places; towards the latter end of Nero's reign, he returned to Rome, where he found the minds of the people strangely bewitched, and hardened against Christianity, by the subtilities and magical arts of ^a Simon Magus, whom he had formerly defeated at Samaria.

Provoked at this general infatuation, the apostle thought himself concerned to oppose this sorcerer; and having, ^b in some instances, discovered the vanity of his impostures, he wrought him up, at length, to such a pitch of madness and desperation, that to give the people an evident demonstration of his being the 'Son of God,' as he pretended, he promised that on such a day, he would ascend visibly up into heaven. Accordingly at the time appointed, he went up to the mount of the capitol, and, throwing himself from the top of the rock, began his flight, and by the help of some infernal powers, seemed to be posting to heaven; when immediately upon the

^a Justin Martyr assures us, that this impostor was honoured as a deity: that a statue was erected to him in the Insula Tyberina, with this inscription, Simoni Deo sancto, which is confirmed by the testimony of Irenæus, Tertullian, and several others after them. Whatever therefore may be said to shake the credit of this inscription, it can hardly be thought, that Justin Martyr, who was a person of great learning and gravity, inquisitive about things of this nature, and at this time at Rome, where he might fully satisfy himself of the truth of it, would have inserted any thing in his Apology to the emperor and the senate of Rome, but what he knew would bear the test; and yet he speaks twice of this statue, and desires of them, that if, upon inquiry, they should find what he said to be true, they would abolish it.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles, and Whitby's Preface to the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians.

^b A noble instance of this kind we have in Hegesippus the younger. 'There was at this time,' says he, 'in Rome, a gentleman of some note, a kinsman to the emperor, lately dead. Those who knew St Peter's power in working miracles, advised his friends to send for him, and others likewise prevailed that Simon the magician might be sent for. Glad of this occasion to magnify himself before the people, Simon propounded to Peter, that if he raised the man to life, Peter, who had reviled 'the mighty power of God,' as he styled himself, should lose his life; but that if Peter prevailed, he would submit to the same penalty. Peter accepted the challenge; and, when Simon began his charms and enchantments, the dead body seemed to move his hand. Whereupon the people who stood by, thinking that the person was alive, were going to fall foul upon Peter, for daring to oppose so great a power. But Peter, intrating their patience, desired only that the magician might be removed from the bed-side: which, when they had done, the deception vanished, and the body remained without the least sign of motion. Then Peter, standing at a good distance from the bed, silently made his address to Heaven; and when he had so done, in the presence of them all, commanded the man, in the name of the Lord Jesus, to arise; which he instantly did: so that the people, changing their minds, were going to stone the magician; but that Peter interposed for his life, by telling them, that it would be punishment enough to him, to live and see, that, in despite of all his power and malice, the kingdom of Christ would increase and flourish.'—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

apostle's prayer to God, that the people might be undeceived, and the cheat detected, his invisible supports withdrew, and ^c down he came headlong, so miserably bruised and wounded with his fall, that in a short time after he expired.

Nero, the emperor, was a professed patron of magicians, and of all such as maintained a secret commerce with the infernal powers. He had a particular dislike to the doctrine of Christianity likewise, as being so very repugnant to the lusts and passions which he indulged; and was not a little offended at the many conversions which St Peter had made, in persons of some distinction, from a vicious and dissolute course of life, which the emperor admired in any: so that he not only commanded him, and St Paul, who was at this time at Rome, to be apprehended, and cast into prison; but, by a public edict, raised the ^d first general persecution against the church, wherein Christians of all orders and degrees were ^e treated with the utmost contempt and cruelty.

^c It must be owned, that the truth of this whole transaction, between St Peter and Simon Magus, has been greatly suspected, not only upon the account of the small authority of those apocryphal writers from whom it was first taken, but by reason of the great disagreement likewise, which appears in their relation of the several circumstances of it. For whereas some of them say, that Simon Magus made himself wings to fly with; others affirm, that he was invisibly held up by two devils; others, that he made himself a chariot; and others again, that he ascended in a fiery one drawn by four horses, but all done by the art of magic; and whereas some say, that by this fall he crushed his whole body to pieces; and others, that he dashed out his brains; others aver, that he only broke a thigh, a leg, or an arm; and this done in the reign of Claudius, according to some; but in the reign of Nero, according to others; by Peter alone, as some will have it; but by Peter and Paul in conjunction, according to the report of others. Nor is it a small discredit to this story, that the ancients of the three first centuries, who speak much of Simon's being at Rome, and having his statue erected there, should say nothing of his flight, or his fall, though they had just reason to speak of them, had they believed them true: 'Nor is it credible,' saith Hornius, 'that all the Roman writers of those times, Suetonius, Tacitus, Pliny, &c. should pass over so memorable a thing in silence;' especially if Simon was so honoured by Claudius, and beloved by Nero, as some authors of this story say he was. This is the substance of what is alleged against it; and yet, according to others, it is fully attested by the Apostolic Constitutions; hinted at in the Recognitions; taken for a known fact by such as lived nearest to Rome, namely, Arnobius, Ambrosius, and St Jerom De Script. Eccles.; fully mentioned by Eusebius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, and many others; contradicted by no one ecclesiastical writer; and yet supposed to be alluded to in that passage of Suetonius, where he tells us, that Icarus, or one that flew in the air, in his first attempt, fell down near the emperor's pavilion, and sprinkled his blood upon him.—Whitby's Preface to the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians and Whiston's Answer to the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion.—The stories respecting St Peter and Simon Magus should be dismissed as idle legends, utterly unworthy of the attention of any rational and intelligent mind. The authority of the Apostolic Constitutions is not of much weight, when we consider that they are the spurious productions of the fourth century.—Ed.

^d Before the Roman empire was converted to Christianity, there are commonly reckoned ten general persecutions: the first, in the 10th year of Nero, A. D. 64; the second, in the 14th of Domitian, A. D. 95; the third, in the 3d of Trajan, A. D. 100; the fourth, in the 2d of Antoninus Philosophus, A. D. 165; the fifth in the 4th of Severus, A. D. 197; the sixth, in the 1st of Maximinus, 235; the seventh, in the 1st of Decius, A. D. 249; the eighth, in the 4th of Valerian, A. D. 257; the ninth, in the 4th of Aurelian, A. D. 274; and the tenth, in the 19th of Dioclesian, A. D. 303, till at length Christianity came to be established by human laws, A. D. 313.—Echard's Ecclesiastical History.

^e As to the particulars of this persecution, Tacitus tells us,

A. M. 4067. A. D. 63; OR, A. M. 5474. A. D. 63, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

In this common calamity Andrew, the apostle, and as most think, the younger brother of St Peter, was called to suffer. He, having preached the gospel, wrought many miracles, and suffered many hardships in the wild northern countries of Scythia and Sogdiana, and, after that, in some of the provinces of the lesser Asia, came at length into ^a Epirus and Achaia, ^b two provinces of Greece, where he still added more converts to the Christian faith. At last, in ^c Patrea, a city of Achaia, Ægeas the proconsul, observing the multitudes that by the apostle's preaching had fallen off from paganism and embraced Christianity, and being not a little offended at his opposing his mandates for the re-establishment of idolatry, and undauntedly persisting in his publication of the doctrine of a crucified Saviour, condemned him to the death which he so much extolled. After seven lictors therefore had cruelly torn his naked body, he was led out with great cheerfulness and serenity of mind to be crucified. But his cross was not of the usual form: it was made of two pieces of timber, crossing each other in the middle, in the shape of the letter X, which ever since has been known by the name of St Andrew's cross, and to this he was fastened, not with nails, but cords, to make his death more painful and lingering. In this condition he hung for the space of three days, all the while teaching and instructing the people, exhorting them to constancy and perseverance in that religion which he had delivered to them; and, when great intercessions were made to the proconsul for his life, earnestly requesting of our Lord in prayer, that he might on that day, which was the last of November, depart, and seal the truth of his religion ^d with his blood.

How the two apostles Peter and Paul escaped out of prison, from the rage of this persecution, we have no account: ^e but, from the writings of the latter, some have gathered, that, returning from Rome into Judea, and there continuing a short time, he thence passed into Asia, where Timothy met him at Ephesus; that from thence he made a visit to the Colossians, whom he had never seen before; and, after a considerable stay, returning to Ephesus again; ^f excommunicated Hymeneus ^g and Alex-

11 Tim. i. 20.

^d His body being taken down from the cross, and embalmed, was decently and honourably interred by Maximilla, a lady of great quality and fortune; but afterwards, by Constantine the Great, it was solemnly removed from Patrea to Constantinople, and there buried in a great church which he had built in honour of all the apostles.—Cave's Lives.

^e It does not appear to me that St Peter and St Paul were ever prisoners together at Rome but under the reign of Nero, when they both suffered martyrdom. St Paul, indeed, was twice a prisoner there; but that St Peter was twice a prisoner likewise, seems to rest on no other evidence, than that, as his first epistle is dated from Babylon, by which Rome is supposed to be meant, and as a considerable portion of time is supposed to have elapsed between the writing of his first and his second epistle, he must have been in Rome before the reign of Nero. It has been shown, however, by Michaelis, that the Babylon from which he dates his first epistle was certainly either the ancient Babylon on the Euphrates, which was even then a populous city, or Seleucia on the Tigris, sometimes called New Babylon; and it is indeed in the highest degree improbable in itself, that any man would date a serious epistle from any place designed by a mystical name, by which that place is not generally known. It seems therefore little less than certain, that St Peter did not go to Rome till some time after St Paul's liberation from his first imprisonment there, about the year 63 or 64; and that his first epistle was written at least some years before that period.—Michaelis's Introduction, vol. iv. and Larber's Supplement,—Gleig.

^f This Hymeneus was very probably a citizen of Ephesus, who being converted by some of St Paul's first sermons, fell afterwards into the heresy of those who denied the resurrection of the body, and affirmed, that there was no other resurrection than that of the soul, which, by faith and baptism, is revived from sin to grace. The Alexander who was his colleague in this heresy, was doubtless the copper-smith, whom St Paul, in his second epistle to Timothy, loudly complains of, as greatly obstructing the good effect of his preaching, (chap. iv. 14.) but whether he was the same Alexander who would have addressed himself to the multitude which Demetrius the silver-smith of Ephesus had drawn together, (Acts. xix. 24.) is a matter of some doubt. However this be, it is certain, that their notion of no other resurrection than a spiritual one, was destructive of the very foundations of Christianity, which are laid in the hopes of a resurrection from the dead; and therefore the apostle thought it expedient that, at first several were seized who made profession of this new religion; and by their confession, infinite numbers of others were detected and executed; and in the manner of their execution, were treated with all the instances of scorn and barbarity. Some of them were wrapt up in the skins of wild beasts, and worried and devoured by dogs; others were crucified; and others burnt alive, in paper coats dipped in pitch, wax, and other combustible matters, that, when day-light failed, they might serve for torches and illuminations in the night. Nero exhibited these spectacles in his own gardens, impiously joining to them the diversions of the Cirque, and appearing himself publicly in the habit of a charioteer, sitting in his chariot, which yet the people entertained more with pity than pleasure, as knowing they were not done for the public benefit, but merely to gratify the tyrant's private rage and malice.—Echard's Ecclesiastical History, b. 1. c. 7.

^a This is a province of Greece, in its largest acceptation, lying along the coast of the Ionian sea, and having for its bounds on the north Albania, on the north-east Thessaly, on the south-east Achaia, and on the west the ocean. This country was anciently governed by its own princes, then united to the kingdom of Macedon; after that subjected to the Romans; then restored to its own princes; but is now in the possession of the Turks.—The Complete Geographer.

^b The ancient name of this country was Hellas, which the Latins changed into Gracia, and the Turks now call Rumelia. It was used by common writers to denote Macedonia, Epirus, Thessaly, Hellas, or Greece properly so called, and the Peloponnese, now Morea; but the Romans distinguished all these into two provinces only, namely, Macedonia and Achaia, under the former of which they comprehended Epirus and Thessaly, and under the latter, Greece properly so called, and the Peloponnese. The word Greece, in the old Testament, generally occurs in its larger acceptation; and in its less in the New; but as for the country itself, it was anciently the most celebrated region of the universe, surpassing all others in arms, arts, and sciences. For many ages it was divided into small kingdoms or states, till Philip king of Macedon, and after him, Alexander, his son, reduced it all under their subjection, and made it a monarchy. This kingdom was afterwards destroyed by the Romans, and made a province of the empire, in which condition it continued though formerly mangled by the Goths and Huns, till the Turks, who are its present masters, overran it, and have long since effaced all its ancient and magnificent monuments, as well as reduced the people to a state of the utmost slavery and stupidity.—Wells's Geography of the New Testament and the Complete Geographer.—Since our author wrote, the Greeks have regained their liberty, and are no longer under the dominion of the Turks.—Ed.

^c This city is seated on a hill near the sea, at a little distance from the mountain formerly called Cerynea, and not above ten miles from the mouth of the gulf Lepanto. It is a place of good trade, very populous, especially of Jews. It is defended with a strong castle, and has the honour to be an archbishop's see, which has, at present, a thousand churches under its jurisdiction. In ancient times the goddess Diana was worshipped here in a cruel manner, having a most beautiful young man and maid every year sacrificed to her, till by the preaching of St Andrew, Eurypilus was converted to Christianity, and then that horrid superstition was laid aside.—The Complete Geographer.

A. M. 4968. A. D. 61; OR, A. M. 5473. A. D. 64. Sc. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

ander, for saying the resurrection of the dead, and other articles of faith; that from thence designing to go into Macedonia, he enjoined Timothy, whom, as we said before, he had constituted bishop of Ephesus, ¹ to have his residence in that large city, and to take the charge of all the proconsular Asia; that arriving in Macedonia, ² he visited Philippi, where he staid a considerable while; and from hence, very probably, sent his first epistle ^a to Timothy; ³ 'wherein he lays down the duties and qualifications of a bishop, as well in respect of his ministry, as of his private conversation, and instructs him in the office of a true Christian pastor.'

From Macedonia, St Paul intending to remove to Nicopolis ^b in Epirus, there to pass his winter, wrote his epistle ^c to Titus, then in Crete, to meet him there; to have them excommunicated, that is, separated from the society of the faithful, and deprived of the privileges of being present at religious assemblies, of partaking of the Lord's supper, and joining in such other holy offices as linked Christians together in one and the same society and communion.—Whitby's Annotations on 2 Tim. ii. 17. iv. 11; and Calnet's Dictionary, under the word.

¹ 1 Tim. i. 3.

² Phil. i. 25, 26.

³ 1 Tim. passim.

^a Among the learned there is no small disagreement as to the time when this epistle was written. That it was written after St Paul's departure from Ephesus to Macedonia, some have gathered from these words, 'when I went into Macedonia, I besought thee to abide at Ephesus;' (1 Tim. i. 3.) and that it was written when he was in expectation of returning shortly thither, they conclude from these, 'I write to thee, hoping to come to thee quickly;' (1 Tim. iii. 14.) From whence they argue, that it must have been written before he came to Miletus, because there he seems to have laid aside all thoughts of returning any more to Ephesus, as he tells the clergy of that place, 'And I know that all you among whom I have gone, preaching the kingdom of God shall see my face no more;' (Acts xx. 25.) And therefore they conclude, that it was written while he was in Macedonia, that is, in the first of Nero, and in the year of our Lord 55. Others allow indeed, that this epistle was written after that St Paul was gone into Macedonia; but then they contend, that this journey into Macedonia was one of those that are recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. In his first journey Timothy went with him, but then the apostle had never seen Ephesus, (Acts xvi. 10, &c.) In his second, though he went from Ephesus, yet so far was he from leaving Timothy there, that he sent him and Erastus before him, (Acts xix. 21, 22.) And in the third, he did not go from Ephesus, but from Greece into Macedonia, whence Timothy accompanied him, first to Jerusalem, and then to Rome, (Acts xx. 3, 4.) So that there could be no possibility for St Paul to leave Timothy at Ephesus, while himself departed into Macedonia, till after the time of his return from Rome. They therefore suppose, that after he was released from his confinement, he returned into Asia; and having made some stay at Ephesus, went from thence into Macedonia; that this is the time when he besought Timothy to abide still at Ephesus; and, consequently, that this epistle was written to him about the 10th of Nero, and in the year of our Lord 63. For since, in the course of the history of the Acts, (which extends as far as St Paul's imprisonment,) we can find no room to place this epistle, we must necessarily refer it to the time which was subsequent to his release, and when he went to revisit the churches which he had planted in the east.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Preface to the first Epistle to Timothy.

^b Nicopolis, by the Turks called Sciltaro, stands on the Danube, at the mouth of the Iatrus, or Ischar, twenty-five miles north from Silitria. It was built by the emperor Trajan, in memory of his victory over king Decebalus; and near this place, Sigismund king of Hungary was unfortunately defeated by Bajazet the Turkish emperor, A. D. 1416, which was owing more to the divisions among the Christians, than the bravery of the Turks; for of the latter there fell sixty thousand, but of the former only twenty, as history relates.—The Complete Geographer.

^c There is some dispute among the learned concerning the time when this epistle was written. That it was written after the time that St Paul had left Titus at Crete, (Titus i. 5.) cannot wherein he describes to him, as he had done to Timothy, the qualifications which a bishop ought to have, and more especially a bishop of Crete, where some sharpness and severity was necessary, amidst a people of their perverse and obstinate tempers; wherein he admonishes him, not to suffer the flock committed to his charge to be led away by the delusions of Judaizing Christians; and wherein he lays down precepts for people of all conditions of life, even not forgetting servants, because Jesus Christ has poured out his grace upon all men.'

From Nicopolis, as soon as winter was over, St Paul went a third time to Corinth, where ⁴ he appointed Erastus to continue. Thence crossing the sea into Asia, he came to Ephesus; where, upon his departure, he left Timothy in tears; and so proceeded to Miletum, where he left Trophimus sick. From Miletum he travelled northward to Troas, and lodged with Carpus, ^a one of

⁴ 2 Tim. iv. 20.

he denied; but then the question is, when St Paul was at Crete, since, in all the Acts of the Apostles, we find no footsteps of his being there. In his voyage to Rome, indeed, the vessel in which he sailed, touched at the Fair Havens, belonging to Crete; but as that was no commodious harbour, she soon set sail from thence, in hopes to make Phenice, another port in the same island, but by contrary winds was drove another way. Whether St Paul at this time had Titus in company with him, it no where appears; but the short stay which he made at the Fair Havens, which was only to consult whether they should winter there or not, will not permit us to think—especially considering, that at this time he was a prisoner in bonds—either that he attempted to preach the gospel there, or that he had any occasion to leave Titus in the island, 'to set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city.' As therefore we said before, in relation to the epistle to Timothy, namely, that after St Paul was restored to his liberty, he returned into the east to visit the churches which he had planted: in his voyage from Rome to Jerusalem, he might conveniently enough call at Crete; after he had staid, and preached some time there, leave Titus behind him, to regulate such matters as he had not time and opportunity himself to do; and, in a year or two after, that is, in the 12th of Nero, and of our Lord 65, send him this letter to renew his instructions, and to request his company. For, that this epistle was written after the apostle had obtained his discharge, is manifest from his making no mention of his bonds and temptations, as he does in his epistle to the Ephesians, (chap. vi. 20.) to the Philippians, (i. 7.) to the Colossians, (iv. 18.) to Philemon, (ver. 9.) and in his second to Timothy, (chap. i. 8.) and whoever compares this epistle to Titus, with the two to Timothy, will find such an affinity in their subjects, the same sentiments, and the same instructions, occasioned by the same set of men who began now to appear in the east, and spread their fables and impostures every where, as will easily convince him that they were all written much about the same time, though the first to Timothy seems to be of prior date to that to Titus, even as that to Titus may be thought to precede the second to Timothy. In relation to Titus, (for this is the last time we shall meet with him in our history,) after having preached the gospel in Dalmatia, (2 Tim. iv. 10.) he is said to have returned into Crete; to have propagated the Christian religion in the neighbouring islands; and, dying in the ninety-fourth year of his age, and being buried in Crete, to have had the cathedral church of the island dedicated to his name.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Preface to the Epistle to Titus, and Calnet's Commentary.

^d We know very little of the life of Carpus, only that he must be a different person from St Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, and from that other Carpus whom the false Dionysius, in his letter to Demophilus, makes mention of. The Greeks tell us a great many particulars of him, which are far from being certain. They affirm, that he was one of the seventy disciples; that he propagated the truth in several places; that he wrought abundance of miracles; that he was St Paul's assistant in preaching the gospel, and was employed by him in carrying his epistles. They make him bishop of Berea, and say, that he died in peace.—Calnet's Commentary, and Dictionary under the word.

A. M. 4069. A. D. 65; OR, A. M. 5476. A. D. 65, &c. FROM ACTS. I. 10. TO THE END.

his disciples, where¹ he left his cloak,^a some books and parchment-rolls; and, in all probability, about this time it was that he suffered those persecutions and afflictions at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra,² whereof he makes mention to Timothy, and thanks God for his deliverance from them. But though God was pleased to deliver him from these afflictions, yet it was not long before he discovered to him the near approach of his death, and gave him to know particularly, that at Rome he was to suffer martyrdom: which was so far from retarding, that it made him hasten his journey with joy and alacrity to that place.

It was about the twelfth or thirteenth year of Nero's reign when he came to Rome the second time, where meeting and joining with Peter, they both used their utmost endeavours to instruct the Jews in their synagogues, and to convert the Gentiles in all public places and assemblies. This soon raised the malice and indignation of the magistrates, especially of the governor ^b Helius, whom Nero at his departure into Greece, left invested with exorbitant powers, which he exercised after as exorbitant a manner. It was crime enough for these two apostles that they were Christians; but the particular prejudice against Peter is said to have been his defeating Simon Magus, and that against Paul, his converting one of the emperor's concubines. However this be, apprehended they both were, and cast into prison; where they spent their time in the most solemn acts of devotion, and as occasion offered, preached the gospel to their guards and fellow-prisoners, among whom, it is said, that they converted Processus and Martinian, two captains of the guard, with seven and forty others.

During the time of the apostle's confinement, St Peter wrote his second general epistle ^c to the converted Jews who were dispersed in the several provinces of Asia:

¹ 2 Tim. iv. 13.² 2 Tim. iii. 21.

^a What we are to understand by St Paul's cloak, will best be resolved in our answers to the following objections. We have only to observe here, that the time when he left his cloak was not when he went from Troas to Assos, in his journey to Jerusalem; for then, as bishop Pearson says, he could have no cause to leave any thing of moment, having so many to accompany him on his journey, as well as a ship to attend him, (Acts xx. 4, 6, 13,) but it was in his travels after he was set at liberty, and had left Rome, or rather in his return to Rome again, that, in the hurry of his departure, he left some things with Carpus, which he afterwards found he wanted.—Whitby's Annotations, and Calnel's Commentary.

^b He is called Casarianus, as being the emperor's freedman, and by the apostle the Lion, (2 Tim. iv. 17,) by reason of his cruelty against Christians.

^c That this epistle was written by St Peter is evident both from the inscription it bears, and the concurrence of circumstances in it relating to that apostle, and none else; and therefore we may suppose, that the true reason of its late reception into the list of the holy scriptures, was not so much its difference of style, as its not being addressed to any particular church that might have taken care to preserve it, and in due time to have entered its claim for a place in the canon. And that it was indited, not after the destruction of Jerusalem, as some will have it, but a little before the author's death, not improbably in the 13th of Nero's reign, A. D. 67, may be justly concluded from this declaration of his, 'I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to put you always in remembrance of these things, knowing that shortly I shall put off this tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me,' (2 Pet. i. 12, 13, 14.—Beausobre's, Whitby's, and Hammond's Preface to the Second Epistle of St Peter.—See also Sherlock's first dissertation at the end of his Discourses on Prophecy and Miracles; Michaelis, vol. iv.

wherein he endeavours, by earnest exhortations, to prevail with them to persevere in the doctrine which they had received, and to testify the soundness and sincerity of their faith by a Christian life comporting therewith; wherein he forewarns them of the false teachers ^d that would shortly spring up among them; foretells their sad and miserable destruction; and describes them by their odious characters, that they might avoid them; wherein he vindicates the doctrine of Christ's coming to judgment, which the heretics of those times denied, that thereby they might encourage men the more securely to pursue their lewd courses; and wherein he describes the ^e great and terrible day of the Lord, when the elements shall melt, and the whole frame of nature be dissolved, thereby to excite them to become circumspect and diligent, in order to be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless.

About the same time St Paul wrote his second epistle ^f to Timothy: wherein he informs him of the near ap-

^d There are three sorts of people which the apostle cautions his converts against in this epistle. 1st. The Solifidians, who talked of attaining salvation by the strength of their faith, or a right belief of the doctrines of Christianity, without any regard to a virtuous life. 2dly. The Nicolaitans, who turned the grace of God into lasciviousness; and, upon the presumption of their being spiritual persons, and the seed of election, averred, that they contracted no guilt, and could receive no pollution from any evil action they did. And 3dly. The scoffers at the promise of Christ's coming to judgment, which they looked upon as a thing that could never be verified, and which the continuance of their persecutions gave the Christians small hopes of expecting.—Whitby's Preface to the second Epistle of St Peter.

^e It is the opinion of the reverend and judicious Dr Hammond, and Dr Lightfoot, that St Peter, in the 3d chapter of his second epistle, does not discourse of our Lord's coming to the general judgment of all mankind: but only of his coming to execute his judgment on the Jews in the final destruction of their church and nation. But besides that this notion is entirely new, and contrary to the sentiments of all the ancients who have commented upon this epistle, it seems obvious at first sight, 'that the day of the Lord, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up,' can mean no other than the great day of judgment. For, to interpret these words of the destruction of Jerusalem only, is to turn them into a metaphor and allegory; whereas St Peter says plainly, that as the old world was destroyed by water, so shall the world that now is be destroyed by fire, (2 Peter iii. 6, 7.) It is usual indeed with the prophets, to represent God's judgments on the enemies of his church and people, by the tragical expressions, 'of burning up the earth, and dissolving the heavens,' (Isa. xiii. 9, &c. xxxiv. 3, &c.) but this solemn exhortation, 'Seeing then all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening to the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, that we may be found of him without spot and blameless?' (2 Pet. iii. 11, 12.) This exhortation, I say, sounds too high for the destruction of Jerusalem, in which they of Pontus and Galatia could not be much concerned; but it is very proper for those who had the lively ideas of the conflagration of the world, and the tremendous judgment and perdition of ungodly men, then set before them.—Whitby's Preface to the Second Epistle of St Peter.

^f That at two different times St Paul was a prisoner at Rome, is evident from the circumstances which himself relates. In his first confinement, he was permitted to live in his hired house, and to receive all that came to him, (Acts xxviii. : 0, 31.) but in his second, he was so closely shut up, that Onesiphorus was forced to inquire diligently after him, before he found him, (2 Tim. i. 17.) In the first, Timothy and Mark were both with him, and constantly attending him, (Phil. i. 1, and Col. iv. 10.) in the second, they were both absent in Asia, and knew nothing of what passed in Rome, (2 Tim. iv. 11.) In the first, Demas had joined himself to him, and was become a fellow labourer in the gospel: in the second, 'out of love to the things of the world,

A. M. 4072. A. D. 68; OR. A. M. 5176. A. D. 68, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

proach of his death; and desires him to come to him before winter, because most of his companions, upon one affair or other, were departed from him: wherein he exhorts him to discharge all the duties of a bishop and pastor, suitable to those excellent gifts he had received, and with a generous contempt of the world, and worldly things: wherein he admonishes him, not to be surprised or disturbed at the apostasy of some from the faith, but to preach the more zealously against such opposers as heaped up to themselves teachers, and left the truth, to turn into fables; and wherein he acquainted him, how, at his first appearing before Helius, all his companions, for fear of being involved in his punishment, forsok him: but that the Lord stood by him, and strengthened him, to make his preaching more conspicuous, and effectual to the Gentiles.¹

How long these two apostles lived under their confinement, we have no certain knowledge; but at last it being determined that they should both die: Peter, as a Jew, and foreigner, was sentenced to be crucified; and Paul, ^a as a Roman citizen, to be beheaded. ^b On the

¹ 2 Tim. iv. 17.

he had forsaken him, and departed to Thessalonica, (2 Tim. iv. 10.) In the first, 'many of the brethren, waxing confident by his words, were much more bold to speak the word without fear,' (Phil. i. 11.) but in the second, they were so intimidated, that 'they all forsok him,' and 'not one man stood with him,' (2 Tim. iv. 16.) And if it thus appears, that St Paul was twice in custody at Rome, himself gives us to understand, that this epistle was written under his latter confinement, and was very probably the last that ever he wrote; for, 'I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have finished my course,' and 'from henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of glory,' (2 Tim. iv. 6, &c.) are the words of one that is approaching to his latter end. This therefore is a strong indication of the singular affection which St Paul had for Timothy, that he favoured him with one of the last letters that he ever wrote, and if, pursuant to this letter, Timothy went to Rome, (as probably he did,) he must have been there when the apostle was led out to suffer, and finished his course in a glorious martyrdom. After the death of St Paul, the history of Timothy is but short; only we may suppose, that he returned to Ephesus, probably the year following, and there continued to govern that church in the capacity of their bishop, until the Pagans of that city, who were great votaries to the goddess Diana, celebrating a festival called Catagogian, in which they carried about the images of their gods, and by means of their masks and clubs, committed a thousand insolences and outrages, Timothy stood in the streets, to oppose and reprove this execrable custom; which so enraged the people, that falling upon him with stones and clubs, they left him for dead. But some of his disciples, finding him to breathe, took him up, and lodged him without the gates, where in two days he expired, and was afterwards buried on a mountain not far from the city.—Whitby's and Beausobre's Preface to the Second Epistle to Timothy, and Euchar's Ecclesiastical History.

^a This was accounted a more noble kind of death, not among the Romans only, but among other nations, as being fitter for persons of better quality, and more ingenious education: and, from this instrument of his execution, the custom no doubt first arose, that in all pictures and images of this apostle, he is constantly represented with a sword in his right hand. He is said to have suffered in the sixty-eighth year of his age; to have been buried in the Via Ostiensis, about two miles from Rome; and by Constantine the Great to have had a stately church, in the year 118, built over his grave. It was adorned with an hundred of the best marble columns, and beautified with the most exquisite workmanship. But as it was afterwards thought to be too narrow and little for the honour of so great an apostle, Valentinian, or rather Theodosius, the emperor, the one but finishing what the other began, by a rescript, directed to Salustius, prefect of the city, caused it to be taken down, and a larger and more noble one to be built in its room.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

^b Many of the ancients positively affirm, that both these apos-

29th of June, as it is generally supposed, St Peter, being first scourged, according to the Roman custom, was led to the top of the Vatican mount, near the Tiber, where he desired the favour of the officers, that he might be crucified with his head downwards, as thinking himself unworthy to suffer in the same posture wherein his Lord and Master had suffered before him. In this manner ^c he expired upon the cross; while St Paul, having converted three of the soldiers that were sent to guard him to his execution, and who, with him a few days after, died martyrs themselves, when he came to the place called Agua Salvie, about three miles out of the city, after some solemn preparations, cheerfully gave up his neck to the fatal stroke.

Thus died ^d the two most eminent apostles of Jesus Christ, after they had, with indefatigable labour, reaped a glorious harvest of infinite numbers of souls, and triumphantly propagated salvation to the most considerable parts of the world; and as they were equally concerned in the foundation of the church of Rome, the one having the Jewish and the other the Gentile converts under his ties suffered on the same day and year; but others, though allowing the same day, tell us, that St Paul did not suffer till a year after St Peter; and some interpose the distance of several years.—Ibid.

^c His body being taken from the cross, was embalmed after the Jewish manner, by Marcellinus the presbyter, and so buried in the Vatican, near the Triumphal way. Over his grave a small church was soon after erected; but when it was destroyed by Heligabalus, his body was removed to the cemetery in the Appian way, two miles distant from Rome. Here it continued till, in the time of pope Cornelius, it was re-conveyed to the Vatican; where it abode in some obscurity, until Constantine the Great, out of the profound reverence he had for the Christian religion, having rebuilt and enlarged the Vatican to the honour of St Peter, enriched it with gifts and ornaments, which in every age, increased in splendour and beauty, till it is become one of the wonders of the world at this day.—Ibid.

^d Before we part with these two apostles, it may not be amiss to take a short survey of their persons and tempers. St Peter, (if we may believe the description which Nicephorus gives us of him,) was of a middle size, but somewhat slender, and inclining to tallness: his complexion was very pale, his hair thick and curled, his eyes black, his eye-brows thin, and his nose large, but not sharp. In his natural temper, (as most Galileans were,) he was warm, eager, and enterprising, stout and courageous in the main, though in some cases his fear prevailed, and destroyed the succours which reason offered. His humility and lowliness of mind was singular, his affection and zeal for his Master wonderful, his love for the souls of men ardent, his diligence in his ministerial office indefatigable, and his rule and conduct in his episcopal capacity, highly prudent and engaging. St Paul, (if we may believe the same Nicephorus,) was of a low and small stature, somewhat stooping, his complexion was fair, his countenance grave, his head small, his eyes sparkling, his nose high and bending, and his hair thick and dark, but mixed with grey. His constitution was weak, and often subject to distempers; but his mind was strong, and endued with a solid judgment, quick invention, and prompt memory, which were all improved by art, and the advantages of a liberal education: his humility and self-abasement was wonderful, his sobriety and temperance singularly strict, his contempt of the world great and generous, his charity to the poor extensive, his love for men's souls universal, his labours in the execution of his ministry incessant, his constancy in the profession of religion invincible, and his style and manner of writing to inculcate it, even by the confession of his enemies, weighty and powerful, (2 Cor. x. 10.) Besides the epistles which are owned to be genuine, several other writings are falsely ascribed to him, as an epistle to the Laodiceans, a third to the Thessalonians, a third to the Corinthians, a second to the Ephesians, his Letter to Seneca, his Acts, his Revelation, his voyage to Thracia, and his Sermons: as the like has been done to St Peter, namely, his Acts, Gospel, Revelation, Preaching, Judgment, and Liturgy.—Ibid.

A. M. 4072. A. D. 68; OR, A. M. 5479. A. D. 68, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

care and government, when both of them were dead, the whole administration of it devolved upon ^a Linus, one of St Paul's disciples, of whom he makes mention in his second epistle to Timothy,¹ and who, after twelve years presiding therein, is said to have suffered martyrdom either in the first or second year of Titus.

One of St Paul's predictions was, that in the Christian church² heresies should arise, for the manifestation of such as were sound in the faith; which prediction began now to be verified: for, besides the immediate followers of Simon Magus^b those of Menander, Ebion, and Cerinthus, as well as others, who are styled³ c Nicoa Tradition is almost unanimous in asserting that the first bishop of Rome was Linus; by which we are to understand that he was the first person appointed over it, after the apostles had left it, and we may, perhaps, safely consider Linus to have entered upon his office as early as the year 58.—Burton's History of the Church.—Ed.

¹ Chap. iv. 21.² 1 Cor. xi. 19.³ Rev. ii. 15.

b Menander was a Samaritan, and, like Simon, a notorious impostor and magician; but abounding with more monstrous illusions than he. He gave it out, that he was a Saviour sent from above for the restoration of mankind; and that whoever was instructed in his occult knowledge, and initiated in his baptism, should enjoy a perpetual immortality, and continue always young and vigorous, even in this world. With these, and several others of his master Simon's opinions, he seduced many in Antioch; and though the extravagancy of his notions made them less infectious, yet they were continued in the second century, particularly by Basilides and Saturninus. Ebion, so called for his affected poverty, was born at Cocaba, a village in Palestine; and spread his heresy in Trachonitis, and among the Christians, who, before the siege of Jerusalem, had retired to Pella. He denied the divinity of our Saviour; and though he acknowledged him for an excellent person, believed him to be no more than the son of Joseph and Mary. He enjoined the observation of the law of Moses as necessary to salvation; received all the writings of the Old Testament, but none of the New, except St Matthew's gospel; and particularly condemned St Paul as an apostate, for proving the dissolution of the Jewish law. Cerinthus spread his heresy in Ephesus, and other parts of Asia Minor; and, in his denial of our Lord's divinity, his acknowledgement of St Matthew's gospel, and asserting the obligation of the Mosaic law, agreed exactly with Ebion; as he did with the Gnostics, in asserting the creation of the world by angels. To insinuate himself with the vulgar, he boasted much of his illuminations and revelations; and, to make the mystery of our Lord's passion more familiar, distinguished between Jesus and Christ, and accordingly taught that Jesus was but a mere man; that Christ descended upon him in the likeness of a dove, and continued with him during the time of his ministry; but that, as Christ was incapable of suffering, he forsook Jesus when he came to be crucified, and left him to die; but his kingdom afterwards, he affirmed, should be terrestrial, in the city of Jerusalem, where men should enjoy all kinds of carnal pleasures for a thousand years.

c The Nicolaitans are supposed to derive their original from Nicolas, one of the deacons mentioned in the 6th of Acts, and, as Clemens Alexandrinus relates the story, not improbably on this occasion. This Nicolas had a beautiful wife, of whom he was said to be jealous; but to show the apostles how far he was from that, he brought her forth one day, and gave any person leave to marry her. Himself was a sober and temperate man, who never knew any woman but his own wife, by whom he had one son and several daughters, who lived all unmarried, and showed that their father was no encourager of lewdness: but so it was, that being accustomed to make use of an expression, which bore an equivocal meaning, namely, 'That we ought to abuse the flesh,' meaning that we ought to mortify and keep it under, by this saying of his, and what he had done in offering his wife, he unhappily gave an umbrage to his disciples and followers to throw off all restraint, and to give themselves over to the grossest impurities, allowing of the most pernicious mixtures, and making corporeal pleasure the ultimate end of man.—Eckhard's and Lamj's Ecclesiastical Histories.

laitans, appearing eager advocates for such principles as sapped the very foundations of the Christian religion, obliged ^d St Jude to write his epistle, in the same manner as St Peter did his, to the Jewish converts, in their several dispersions; 'Wherein he informs them, that his primary intention was, to have wrote to them in general of the common salvation, in order to confirm them in it; yet, seeing the doctrine of Christ attacked on every side by heretics, he thought it more necessary to exhort them to stand up manfully for the defence of the faith once delivered to the saints, and to oppose those false teachers who so earnestly laboured to corrupt them; and that they might know these the better, he describes them in their proper colour, and foretells their future, if not impending destruction: but exhorts them, at the same time, to endeavour by all gentle methods to save them, and to take them out of the fire into which their own folly had cast them.'

It is very observable of this apostle, that the evangelists commonly call him, not Jude, but either ^e Thaddeus, or Lebbæus, out of a particular dislike, no doubt, to the name of Judas, ever since the treacherous and bloody Iscariot betrayed and sold his master: but then the sacred records are so very short in their accounts of him, as well as of the other remaining apostles, that we must, in this case, be beholden to other ecclesiastical writers;—who tell us of this St Jude, that after our Lord's ascent into heaven, having, for some time, preached about d This Jude, who, in the history of the gospel, is styled our Lord's brother, as being the son of Mary, sister to the blessed Virgin, was undoubtedly the brother of James the Less, bishop of Jerusalem, (Mat. xiii. 55), and 'it may be, (as Dr Lightfoot expresses himself,) that St Jude stands up in the charge of his brother James among the circumcision of Judea, and directs his epistle to all such as were sanctified and preserved in those apostatizing times, as his brother had done to all the twelve tribes in general.' Between this and St Peter's second epistle there is certainly a great resemblance. The end aimed at in both, namely, to expose, in their true light, the corrupt principles and practices of the Gnostics, is evidently the same: and the arguments and expressions, in many cases, so much alike, that it has been disputed whether St Jude has here abridged that of St Peter, or St Peter enlarged upon this of St Jude, though most are of the former opinion. And indeed, when we find St Jude quoting expressly this epistle of St Peter, (Jude, ver. 17. compared with 2 Pet. iii. 1, 2.) and alluding to St Paul's second epistle to Timothy, (2 Tim. iii. 1. compared with Jude, ver. 18.) and speaking of the apostles as persons who had been some time dead, we cannot but conclude that this epistle was not written till after the death of the apostles St Peter and St Paul; but how long after we cannot tell.—Whitby's Preface to the Epistle of Jude, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

e The superstitious veneration which the Jews had for the sacred name of Jehovah, would not suffer them to pronounce it in common conversation; and hence it was, that when any man had a name wherein occurred the major part of this ineffable title, as it did in Jehuda, or Juda, they chose rather to change it in common speech, for another of the like importance but different characters; for which reason, Judas, which denotes 'praise,' was changed into Thaddeus, a word of the same signification. Concerning the other name of Lebbæus, conjectures have been various. Some deriving it from an Hebrew word, which signifies the heart, will have it to intimate the extraordinary wisdom and courage of this apostle: while others draw it from a root which imports a lion, and think it an allusion to that prophecy of Jacob, which compares his son Judah to an old lion, and a lion's whelp, (Gen. xlix. 9.) though all this etymology might be spared, if we can but with Dr Lightfoot suppose, that his name was taken from Lebba, a town in Galilee, where he conceives that this apostle was born.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.

A. M. 4072. A. D. 68; OR, A. M. 5479. A. D. 68, &c. FROM ACTS. I. 10. TO THE END.

Judea and Galilee, next in Samaria and Idumea, and then in Syria and Mesopotamia, he travelled at last into Persia, where at the instigation of the Magi, provoked by his open rebukes of their idolatrous worship of the sun, and other superstitions, he was assaulted by the common people, and, after other previous cruelties, crucified;—who tell us of ^a St Simon, that upon the dispersion of the apostles, having preached in Egypt, Cyrene, Africa, Mauritania, and other remote countries thierunto adjoining, at length bent his course westward, and came into ^b Britain where, after many miracles wrought, and great hardships undergone, he was at last put to death for the testimony of the truth, by the then rude and barbarous inhabitants of that island;—who tell us of ^c St Thomas, that, having preached in Media, Persia, Hyrcania, Bactriana, &c. he was at length encouraged by a divine vision to travel into India, where coming into the country of the Brachmans, by the miracles which he wrought, he converted so many, and among others Sagamo, the prince of the country, that the priests, fearing the downfall of their religion, fell upon him, while he was intent at prayer, with stones and darts, and at last, one of them coming nearer, ran him through with a lance;—who tell us of ^d St Philip, that after having made many converts in the Upper Asia, Colchis, and

^a This apostle, to distinguish him, I suppose, from that other Simon surnamed Peter, is styled Simon Zelotes, or Simon the Canaanite; but the latter name, we must observe, does not relate to his country or kindred, but is indeed the same in sense with Zelotes, and derived from an Hebrew, as that is from a Greek word, signifying zeal; but whether this title was given him in regard of any personal warmth or vigour remarkable in him, or whether to denote him one of that sect who were called Zelotes among the Jews, we cannot tell; only we may observe, that if it was upon the latter account, his conversion was more signal, since nothing could be more opposite to the meekness and gentleness of Christianity, than the irregularity and fierceness of that spirit by which this sect was actuated.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.

^b Others say, that, after his preaching the gospel in Egypt, he came into Mesopotamia, and there meeting with St Jude, went with him into Persia, where they both received the crown of martyrdom; for which reason perhaps it is, that the church commemorates them both together in one festival.—Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.

^c It was customary with the Jews, when travelling into foreign countries, or familiarly conversing with the Greeks and Romans, to assume to themselves a Greek or Latin name, of great alibiety, and sometimes of the very same signification with that of their own country; as that of Thomas and Didymus, one in the Syriac, and the other in the Greek, do both signify a twin. He no doubt was a Jew, and in all probability, a Galilean, as well as the other apostles; but the place of his birth, and the nature of his calling, unless we should suppose he was brought up to the trade of fishing, is a thing unknown. It is generally agreed however, that he preached the gospel in the East Indies, by reason of the great numbers of Christians found there in several places, who still go by the name of St Thomas: though there are not wanting some, who ascribe the original of this sect to a person of the same name, who lived many centuries after.—Care's Lives of the Apostles; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.

^d This apostle was born at Beth-aida, a town near the sea of Tiberias; but of his parents, and manner of life, the history of the gospel takes no notice, though probably he was a fisherman, the general trade of the place. He is said to have preached in Upper Asia; to have wrought many miracles in Hierapolis, a city of Phrygia, now called by the Turks Pambuck Kulasi, from the rocks about it, which are white like cotton; and there to have suffered martyrdom, by being fastened to a cross, and stoned to death.—Care's Lives of the Apostles; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. I.

some parts of Scythia, he came at length to Hierapolis, a noted city in Phrygia, where the inhabitants at that time paid their adorations to a ^e dragon, which when the apostle, by his prayers and invocation of the name of Christ, either quite destroyed, or caused to disappear, the magistrates of the place were so exasperated against him, that they threw him into prison, and, after a severe scourging, ordered him either to be hanged or crucified;—who tell us of ^f St Bartholomew, generally supposed to be the same with Nathaniel, that having with great success propagated Christianity in the Higher India, whither he carried St Matthew's gospel, he thence removed into Lycaonia, and came at last to Allinople, a city of the greater Armenia, at this time miserably overrun with idolatry; where having converted their king Polymius, and his wife, and by their example prevailed with multitudes to relinquish their idols, he so far enraged the priests against him, that they instigated Astyages the king's brother to get him into their hands, and to have him ^g first flayed, and then either beheaded or crucified;—who tell us of ^h St Matthias, that having, for some ^e This doubtless was done in memory of that infamous act of Jupiter, who, in the shape of a dragon, insinuated himself into the embraces of Proserpine, his own daughter, begot of Ceres, and whom the Phrygians chiefly worshipped, as Clemens of Alexandria informs us.—Care's Ibid.

^f That Nathaniel and Bartholomew were only two names for one and the same person, the one his proper, and the other his relative name, appears from several passages in the gospels compared together; but then the question is, upon what account it was that he had his relative name conferred on him? That several sects in the Jewish church denominated themselves from some famous person of that nation, as the Essenes did from Enosh, and the Sadducees from Sadoch, cannot be denied; and therefore, if we may suppose that there were others who called themselves Tholmaeus, from Tholmai, scholar to Heber the ancient master of the Hebrews, who flourished in Debir and Hebron, it will be no hard matter to make Nathaniel of this order and institution, and thereupon to give him the name of Bartholomew, that is, a scholar of the Tholmaeus, and so create him, as he is said to have been, a doctor of the Jewish law. But an easier account of this matter is, that as the first syllable of this name signifies a son, the word Bar-tholomew will import no more than the son of Tholmew, or Tholmai, which was no uncommon name among the Jews. And that it was a usual thing among them, for the son thus to derive his name, is evident from the instance of Bar-timæus, which is interpreted the son of Timæus. (Mark x. 46.) and that of Bar-jona, (Mat. xvi. 17.) which St John makes the same with Simon son of Jonas. (John xxi. 25.)—Care's Lives of the Apostles; and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.

^g That excoriation was a punishment in use not only in Egypt, but among the Persians likewise, is evident from the testimony of Plutarch, who records a particular instance of Mesabates the Persian eunuch's being first flayed alive, and then crucified; in Vitæ Artaveræ. And that the Armenians, who were next neighbours to the Persians, might from them borrow this piece of barbarous and inhuman cruelty, is no hard supposition at all.—Care's Lives of the Apostles.

^h As this apostle was not one of the first election, immediately called and chosen by our Saviour, we are not to expect any account of him in the history of the gospel; but from the Acts of the Apostles we learn, that being one of our Lord's disciples, and probably one of the seventy, upon the death of Judas he was elected into the apostleship, which he discharged with great efficacy, and a full demonstration of the Spirit and of power. But there are some things in ecclesiastical story related of him, as particularly when he preached the gospel in Macedonia, and the heathens, to make experiment of his faith, gave him a poisonous potion, that he cheerfully drank it up in the name of Christ, and received no harm, which have not met with so ready a credence, though the instance before us be no more than the completion of our Saviour's promise to his apostles, 'They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them;' (Mark xvi. 18.)—Care's Lives of the Apostles.

A. M. 4072. A. D. 68; OR, A. M. 5479. A. D. 68, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

time, employed himself in the work of the ministry within the confines of Judea, at length he betook himself to other countries, and travelling eastward, came at last to Æthiopia, (or Cappadocia rather,) where, meeting with a people of a fierce and intractable temper, after all his labours and sufferings, and a numerous conversion to the Christian faith, from them he received the crown of martyrdom; but in what manner it was conferred, ^a authors are not agreed; and who tell us of St ^b Barnabas, that, after his separation from St Paul, having preached about Lignria, and settled a church at Milan, (whereof himself was constituted bishop,) he returned at last to Cyprus, his native country, where, by the malice of the Jews, he was tumultuously assaulted, and stoned to death, at Salamis, the principal city of the island. ^c

^a Ancient martyrology reports him to have been seized by the Jews, and, as a blasphemer, to have been first stoned, and then beheaded; but the Greek offices, seconded herein by several ancient breviaries, tell us, that he was crucified; as an hymn cited by Dr Cave out of the Greek offices seems to import. There was a spurious book, called the 'Gospel,' or 'Acts of Matthias,' which, Eusebius tells us, was composed by heretics, and fathered upon him; even as Clemens of Alexandria observes, that Valentinus, Marcion, and Basilides, sheltered their vile tenets under the pretended authority of this apostle.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels, vol. iv.

^b In relation to this apostle, we have only to remark, that he hath left us one epistle, reckoned among the apocryphal writings of the first Christians, which may be genuine perhaps, though not canonical. Its principal design is, to prove, that the law is abolished by the gospel; that legal ceremonies are useless; and that the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ was necessary. It is certainly very ancient, full of piety and zeal, frequently quoted by Clemens of Alexandria, and though written in a style very allegorical, by the labours of our late archbishop Wake is made to the English reader both entertaining and profitable.—Calnet's Dictionary, and Stanhope on the Epistles and Gospels.—The epistle of Barnabas was the production of some Jew, who most probably lived in the second century, and whose mean abilities and superstitious attachment to Jewish fables, show, notwithstanding the uprightness of his intentions, that he must have been a very different person from the true Barnabas, who was St Paul's companion.—Mosheim.—En.

^c Many of the above particulars respecting the lives, actions, and deaths of the apostles, rest on very doubtful authority, and several of them are so wild and extravagant, as to raise strong suspicions of their fabulous nature. The following judicious remarks on the subject, by Dr Burton, will doubtless be read with satisfaction. 'It has already been observed, that we know very little of the personal history of the twelve apostles; but the remark may be repeated here, that they probably did not begin their distant travels till the time of Paul's first journey in 45; and there is reason to think that very few of them survived the destruction of Jerusalem. We have already mentioned the little that is known concerning Peter. James, the brother of John, was beheaded in the year 44, before his apostolical labours could have begun, though the fact of his death may serve to show that he had been a zealous preacher to his countrymen at Jerusalem. John himself outlived all the other apostles, and did not die till the end of the century; so that we shall have occasion to notice him hereafter. Of the nine other apostles, we have very little authentic information, though there are abundant traditions concerning their preaching in distant countries, and suffering martyrdom. These accounts are not supported by the earlier writers, except with relation to Andrew and Thomas: the former of whom is said, by a writer of the third century, to have preached in Scythia, and the latter in Parthia. The term Scythia might be applied to many countries; but Andrew is said more precisely to have visited the country about the Black Sea; and, ultimately, to have died in the south of Greece. If it be true that the apostle Thomas preached in Parthia, we are to understand this expression of the Persian territories; and he is also said to have travelled as far as India. Some persons have thought to find traces of his apostolical labours in a settlement of Christians lately discovered

Thus were all the apostles and first ministers of Christ appointed by God to lay down their lives, in testimony on the coast of Malabar; and we are told that these persons lay claim to the apostle Thomas as their founder. But though this interesting church may be of great antiquity, there is good reason to doubt the truth of such a tradition; and part of the country which is now called Arabia, was often spoken of in ancient times as India. It is, therefore, highly probable that Thomas preached the gospel in the central parts of Asia; and the church of Edessa, a city on the east bank of the Euphrates, may have been planted by this apostle. But the story of Abgarus, the king of that people, having written a letter to our Saviour, and being cured of a disorder by a person sent to him from the apostle Thomas, is worthy of little credit, except as it confirms the tradition of Thomas having preached at Edessa. His remains were shown in that city as early as in the fourth century; and there is reason to think that he did not suffer martyrdom. There is the same doubt concerning the proper meaning of the term India, in another tradition, concerning the apostles Matthew and Bartholomew. It was reported, at the end of the second century, that a Hebrew copy of the gospel, composed by Matthew, had been found in India, which had been brought to that country by Bartholomew. It is plain that a Hebrew translation of this gospel could only have been of use to Jews, who are known to have been settled in great numbers in Arabia; so that, if there is any truth in this story, it probably applies to Arabia, and we may conclude that one or both of these apostles visited that country. Matthew is reported upon other, but later, authority, to have preached in Ethiopia, which was another name occasionally used for Arabia. He is also said to have led a life of rigid abstinence, and not to have met his end by martyrdom. Concerning three of the apostles, Simon, surnamed the Zealot, Matthias, and James the son of Alphaeus, we know absolutely nothing; at least if we follow the opinion expressed in this history, that the James now mentioned was a different person from the bishop of Jerusalem. There was, however, a brother of the bishop, named Jude, who was probably the same with the apostle of that name; and since Paul, in a letter which he wrote in the year 52, speaks of 'the brethren of our Lord' travelling about with their wives, and preaching the gospel, we can hardly help referring the expression to Jude, who at that time was pursuing his apostolical labours; but the particular countries in which he travelled are not known. We learn, from other authorities, that he was married, and left descendants. He was also the writer of the epistle which is still extant; and there is reason to think that he survived most of the other apostles. It has been stated that none of them lived to the end of the century, except John; but it is probable that Philip died at an advanced age; and his residence, in the latter part of his life, was at Hierapolis in Phrygia. He also was married, and had daughters, which was perhaps the cause of his being sometimes confounded with the other Philip, who was one of the seven deacons, and lived at Cesarea, whose unmarried daughters are mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. This brief sketch of the personal history of the Apostles will be unsatisfactory to those who would wish to be furnished with anecdotes concerning the founders of our faith. Such a wish is perfectly reasonable, if materials could be found for gratifying it; and the historian of the Church could not better discharge his duty, when engaged upon the affairs of the first century, than in relating circumstances connected with the lives and deaths of the apostles. Their history would be that of the first propagation of the gospel. But it has been already stated more than once, that we know very little concerning them; and upon this interesting subject, the Christians of the third and fourth centuries appear to have been almost as much in the dark as ourselves. Traditions must have been extant in the second century, connected with the history of the apostles, and collections of them are stated to have been made by writers of that period; but they have not come down to our day, except, perhaps, amidst a heap of extravagant fictions, which make it impossible for us to ascertain whether any of the stories are genuine. The lives of all the apostles may be read in most minute detail, not only in the compilations of modern writers, but in works or fragments of works, which are probably as old as the second century; and we shall see, when we come to that period, that literary forgeries began then to be common, which pretended to relate the personal adventures of the companions of our Lord. The only inspired work upon the subject, which is entitled the Acts of the Apostles, of the truth of the gospel, except the beloved evangelist ^a St John; and yet if we consider his stripes and imprisonment by the council of Jerusalem, his ^b banishment to the isle of Patmos for the word of God, and his being ^c cast into a cauldron of flaming oil by the order of Domitian, we can hardly deny him the honour of being a martyr, since he submitted himself freely to such sufferings as nothing but a miracle could rescue him from.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Of this apostle the same ecclesiastical writers tell us, that ^d after the death of the blessed mother, which happened about fifteen years after our Lord's ascension, by the special conduct of the Holy Ghost, he was carried into Asia, on purpose to oppose the heresies which in those parts began to spread and infest the church: that, as he spared no pains in preaching the gospel where it was wanted, and in confirming it where it had been settled, many churches of note and eminence, besides those mentioned in the beginning of his Revelation, were of his foundation; that in the persecution raised by Domitian, the proconsul of Asia sent him bound to might, with more propriety, be termed the Acts of Paul; and they do not bring down his history beyond the termination of his first imprisonment at Rome. The account of his second imprisonment, and of his death, might have been related much more minutely, if credit could be given to the statements of later writers; but it is impossible to do so, in the great majority of instances, without laying aside every principle of sound and rational criticism: and the same remark will apply to the voluminous legends which are still extant concerning the rest of the apostles.—Burton's History of the Church.—E.D.

^a Theophylact, and others before him, were of opinion, that our apostle died a martyr, upon no other ground than what our Saviour told him and his brother, that they should 'drink of the cup, and be baptized with the baptism wherewith he was baptized,' which St Chrysostom strictly understands of a bloody death. This was indeed literally verified of his brother James; but the general sense of antiquity is, that St John died in his bed.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles.

^b This punishment, in the Roman law, is called capitis diminutio, because the person thus banished was disfranchised, and the city thereby lost an head. It succeeded in the room of that ancient punishment, Aquæ et igni interdicere, whereby it was implied, that the man must, for his own defence, betake himself into banishment, when it became unlawful for any to accommodate him with lodging or diet, or any other necessary of life. But this banishing into islands was properly called dispartitio, being accounted the worst kind of exile, whereby the criminal forfeited his estate, and being bound and put on shipboard, was, by public officers, transported to some certain island, (which none but the emperor himself might assign,) there to be confined to perpetual banishment. The place to which St John was carried was Patmos, a little island in the Archipelago, now called Palmosa, mountainous, but moderately fruitful, especially in wheat and pulse, though defective in other commodities. The whole circumference of the island is about thirty miles, and on one of the mountains stands a town of the same name, having on the top of it a monastery of Greek monks; and on the north side of the town, the inhabitants, by tradition, show an house in which the Apocalypse was written, and not far off, the cave where it was revealed, both places of great esteem and veneration with the Greeks and Latins.—Cave's Lives of the Apostles, and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^c This is a point of history that has of late been called in question; but, since it is attested by Tertullian, De prescript. c. 36, a most learned and very honest man, and who lived near enough the time to be certified of the truth; since it is contradicted by no ecclesiastical writer that we know of: is no more incredible than St Paul's taking up a viper unhurt, (Acts xviii. 3, &c.) and is agreeable to the intimation given of St John, that he should not die a martyr, (John xxi. 21, 22.) there can be no reason for cavilling at this in those that admit of the possibility of any miracle.—Collins's Grounds, &c., and Whiston's Answer.

^d Cave's Life of St John, and Eichard's Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii.

Rome, as an asserter of Atheism, and a subverter of the religion of the empire, where he was treated with the utmost barbarity, and at length banished into a desolate island, there to be employed in digging in the mines; that in this desolate place, however, he was entertained with the more immediate converse of heaven, and by frequent visions and prophetic representations, had a clear prospect given him of the state of Christianity in the future periods and ages of the church, ^e which he has transmitted to us; that upon the death of Domitian, when Nerva had rescinded all his odious edicts, our apostle took the opportunity to return to Ephesus, and as Timothy had lately been dead, at the request of the bishops of the province, entered upon the administration of that metropolitan see, and therein continued till the reign of Trajan; that, in the time of his ruling this church, he wrote three several epistles; whereof the first is called Catholic, calculated, as it were, for all times and places: in which he excites his little children, as he calls all Christians, to love and charity, to holiness and purity of manners; cautions them against resting in a naked and empty profession of religion, against being led away by the crafty insinuations of seducers; antidotes them against the poison of the Gnostic principles and practices; and gives them most excellent rules for the conduct of the Christian life. ^f The other two are but short, and ^e The Apocalypse, or book of Revelations, as we call it, was of old, not only condemned by heretics, but controverted by many of the fathers likewise. Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, tells us, that for his part, he durst not reject it, being persuaded, that it contained many wise and admirable mysteries, though he could not comprehend them; and that though he owned the author to have been a divinely-inspired person, yet he could not believe it to be St John the apostle and evangelist, because the style, matter, and method of it, did nowise agree with his other writings. The common current of antiquity however runs another way; and, as the diversity of style, &c. is of no moment in this case, because that in subjects which are so vastly different, it is hardly possible for any man to observe the same tenor and way of writing, the book being wrote in the island Patmos, which is a circumstance compatible to none but St John; his name so frequently occurring in it, his styling himself a brother and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ; his writing particular epistles to the seven churches in Asia, all planted, or at least cultivated by him; together with doctrines contained in them, all suitable to the apostolic spirit and temper; these are so many concurring evidences to prove our apostle to have been the author of it, whatever was the occasion of its not being received so readily into the canon of scripture.—Cave's Life of St John.

^f The design of this epistle is, 1st. To refute, and to guard the Christians to whom he wrote against erroneous and licentious tenets, principles, and practices: such as the denial of the real deity and proper humanity of Christ, of the reality and efficacy of his sufferings and death as an atoning sacrifice, and the assertion, that believers being saved by grace, were not required to obey the commandments of God. These principles began to appear in the church of Christ even in the apostolic age, and were afterwards maintained by the Cerinthians, and other heretics who sprang up at the close of the first and second century of the Christian æra. 2dly. To stir up all who profess to know God, to have communion with him, and to believe in him, that they walk in the light and not in darkness (i. 5—7.), that is, in holiness and not in sin; that they walk as Christ walked (ii. 6.); and that they keep the commandments, and especially abound in sincere brotherly love towards each other. (ii. 4, 9—11. iii. 10—24. iv. 20, 21. v. 1—3.) This rational and Christian spirit, the apostle enforces, upon the best principles, and with the strongest arguments, derived from the love of God and of Christ; showing the utter insufficiency of faith, and the mere external profession of religion, without the accompanying evidence of a holy life and conduct. 3dly. To help forward and to provoke real Christians to communion with God and the Lord directed to particular persons; the one to a lady of honourable quality, encouraging her and her children to charity, to perseverance in good works, and to show no countenance to false teachers and deceivers; the other to the charitable and hospitable Gaius, so kind a friend, so courteous an entertainer of all indigent Christians.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

The same authors tell us, that in his archiepiscopal capacity, he took great care of the flock of Christ, and notwithstanding his advanced age, went many journeys into the neighbouring provinces, to ordain bishops, to settle and confirm churches, and was induced at last, by the request and importunity of several of his disciples, even when he was ninety-seven years of age, to compose his gospel,^a for a defence against the heresies then brooding, and for a supply of what the other evangelists had omitted; for, as we cannot but suppose, that in the course of the many years which he lived, he had seen the writings of all the rest of the apostles and evangelists, and signified his approbation of them; so we can hardly imagine any thing more worthy his care, or more necessary in itself, than for him to ascertain the authority of those writings, and to finish and settle the canon of scripture, that it might be the rule of faith and practice, and the church's preservative against^b such heresies as were very numer-

Jesus Christ (i. 3, 4); to constancy in the true faith, against all that seduced them (ii. 24—28.); to purity and holiness of life (ii. 1. iii. 3—13.), and that those who believe on the name of the Son of God, may know that they have eternal life. (v. 13.)—Horne's Introduction.

a The ancients assign two reasons especially for the writing of this gospel. The first is, that he might obviate the early heresies of those times, especially of Ebion and Cerinthus, and the rest of that party, who began openly to deny Christ's divinity, and that he had any existence before his incarnation. The other is, that he might supply those passages of the evangelical history, which the rest of the sacred writers had omitted; and therefore collecting the other three evangelists, he first set to them his seal, ratifying the truth of them with his approbation, and then added his own gospel to the rest; wherein he chiefly insists upon the acts of Christ from the first commencement of his ministry to the death of John the Baptist, in which the others were most defective; and wherein he largely records his discourses, because some of them were passed by, but takes not so much notice of his miracles, because they were sufficiently related by the rest.—Care's Life of St John.

b The heresies that were then springing up and not long after overspread the church in divers places, were those of Menander, Cerinthus, and Ebion, whereof we shall give our reader this short account.—Menander was a Samaritan, a great disciple of Simon Magus, of whose tenets and doctrines we have spoken before, and a notorious impostor and magician, as well as he. He maintained, that the world was made by angels, denied the reality of Christ's manhood, and affirmed, that himself was the true Saviour of the world, sent from above for the restoration of mankind; that, without being initiated into his magical knowledge, and baptized in his name, none could be saved; that his baptism was the true resurrection, which, to those that were partakers of it, would not fail to convey, even in this life, youth, vigour, and perpetual immortality. These were some of the illusions wherewith he seduced many in Antioch, the place where he chiefly resided; and though their extravagance made them less infectious, yet they were continued in the second century by Basilides and Saturninus.—Cerinthus was a Jew by birth, and spread his notions principally in Ephesus, and other parts of Asia Minor. He maintained, that the world was not made by God, but by a certain power, distinct and very different from the supreme being; that the old law and precepts of Moses were to be observed, in conjunction with those of Jesus Christ; that Jesus was no more than a mere man, born of Joseph and Mary, but that, at his baptism, Christ descended upon him like a dove; that, at his crucifixion, Christ forsook him, and, returning into heaven, left him to suffer alone; and, lastly, that, after the general resurrection, Christ's kingdom should be terrestrial, in the city of Jerusalem, where men should enjoy all sorts of carnal pleasures, and pass their time in the celebration of marriage feasts and banquets for a thousand years.—Ebion, so called from his affected poverty, was born in a village of Palestine, and spread his heresy in Trachonitis. He agreed with Cerinthus in denying the divinity of our Saviour, and enjoining the observation of the law of Moses, as necessary to salvation. He asserted, that God had given the dominion of all things to Christ and the devil; and that, as the latter had the ascendancy in this world, so the former should have the greater superiority in the next. All the prophets after the time of Joshua, and all the New Testament, except the gospel of St Matthew, he rejected; and as for the writings of St Paul, these he utterly condemned, as the product of a wicked and vile apostate, because he endeavoured to prove the dissolution of the Mosaic law.—Fleury's and Echard's Ecclesiastical Histories, and Tillemont's History of the Emperors, vid. p. 1109.

c It has indeed been said by some writers, that what is called the canon of Scripture was settled by the apostle John shortly before his death. But there seems little foundation for such a statement, if it mean that all the books which are now contained in the New Testament were then collected into a volume, and received the authoritative sanction of the last of the apostles. That John had read all the writings of the other apostles and evangelists, can hardly be doubted; for they were composed and published many years before his own death. We may also be certain that he could not be deceived or mistaken as to the real author of any of these writings; so that in this sense he may be said to have settled the canon of Scripture: but there is no evidence of his having left any decision or command upon the subject. But though we may not admit the tradition that John settled the canon of the New Testament by any formal and authoritative act, yet he may be said to have finally closed it by his own writings: for it is certain that no work has been admitted into the canon or list of the New Testament, whose date is subsequent to the death of John. There is no evidence that the canonical books were ever more numerous than they are at present. None have been lost or put out of the canon; and when we think of the vast number of Gospels and Acts which were circulated in the second and third centuries, and which bore the names of apostles and their companions, we may well ascribe it to more than human carefulness that none of these spurious compositions ever found a place among the canonical Scriptures. On the other hand, there is reason to think that a few of the writings which now form part of the New Testament, were not universally received in the first century, and for some time later. The Epistle to the Hebrews, that of Jude, the second Epistle of Peter, and the second and third of John, were among this number; and there were some churches which do not appear to have received them so early as the rest. This, however, only shows the extreme caution which was used in settling questions of this kind. It was very possible for a letter to be preserved and read in Asia Minor, or Palestine, and yet for many years to have elapsed before it became known in other parts of the empire. As Christianity spread, and the intercourse between distant churches became more frequent, the doubts which had been entertained as to the genuineness of any writing were gradually removed; and though some churches were later than others in admitting the whole of the New Testament, there is no evidence that any part of it was composed later than the end of the first century; so that, though we may reject the tradition of the canon of Scripture having been settled by John, we can hardly doubt, as was before observed, that he had seen and read the writings of all the other apostles before his death.—Burton's History of the Church.—Ed.

d The general opinion is, that he was ninety-eight or ninety-nine years of age when he died, which was in the third year of Trajan's reign; St Chrysostom however is very positive that he was an hundred years old when he wrote his gospel; and Dorotheus affirms, that in the whole he lived an hundred and twenty. But all this is highly improbable; for, according to this account, he must be fifty years of age when he first became acquainted

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5609. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Ephesus,^a was buried in that city, where several of the fathers observe, that his tomb in their time was remaining, in a church, which was built to his honour, and called by his name. Thus we are come to the conclusion of the apostolic age, and so have brought our history to its intended period.

CHAP. II.—Objections answered, and difficulties obviated.

THAT the history of the Acts of the Apostles was written by St Luke, who was the author of the gospel that goes under his name, the connection of the matter, the congruity of the style, the identity of the person to whom they are both addressed, and the unanimous consent of all antiquity,^b are a sufficient indication: ¹ that this is an history of thirty years' transactions; whereof the former part principally contains the acts of the two apostles of the circumcision, Peter and John, with their preaching of the gospel to the Jews; and the latter, those of the two apostles of the uncircumcision, Paul and Barnabas, with the plantation and progress of the gospel among the Gentiles, no one can doubt, that casts but an eye into its contents: and that this history obtained the name of the Acts of the Apostles, it is generally thought,² not only because the doctrines which it contains, and the miracles which it relates, are the same throughout with what they all wrought and taught in common, but because sundry transactions that are recorded in the beginning of it, such as the resurrection and ascension of Christ, the election of Matthias, the descent of the Holy Ghost, and the miraculous infusion of languages, which enabled with our Lord; a thing directly contrary to the testimony of all antiquity, which makes him very young at the time of his being called to the apostolic office.—Cave's Life of St John.

¹ Echard's Ecclesiastical History, p. 310.

² Beausobre's Preface to the Acts of the Apostles.

a John has himself told us in his gospel, that a notion had been entertained that he was not to die; and we know from history, that reports were circulated in later times which confirmed such an expectation. There is no need to expose the erroneousness of such a belief. A writer of the second century mentions his tomb as being then to be seen at Ephesus; and there is every reason to think that he died in that city. It has been said that the Virgin Mary accompanied him when he went to settle in that part of Asia; and it is very probable that such was the fact, if she had not died at an earlier period; but unless her life was protracted to an unusual length, she was released from her earthly pilgrimage before the time when John is supposed to have gone to Asia. It is perhaps singular, that no authentic account has been preserved of the latter days of one who had received the high privilege of being called the mother of our Lord; but nothing whatever is known of her from the New Testament, after the time that her Son had ascended into heaven, and she was left with his apostles and followers in Jerusalem. The same spirit of invention which gave rise to so many stories concerning the apostles, has also supplied many marvellous occurrences which befell the Virgin Mary; but they can only be read to be rejected, and claim no place in the authentic annals of the Church.—Burton's History of the Church.—Ed.

b Thus we find it cited by St Clement, St Paul's companion, epist. ad Corinth. : by Papias, who conversed with men of the apostles' times, (apud Euseb. Eccl. Hist. b. v. c. 39.); and by Polycarp, who was St John's disciple, (ad Philip. b. iii. c. 13.); Irenæus, who flourished in the second century, in a large chapter of his, has almost epitomized it; nor did we ever read of any Jew or Gentile who excepted against its truth and authority.—Whitby's Preface to the Acts.

them to spread the gospel through the universe, were things wherein they were all equally concerned. But then, why the actions of all those who were equally concerned in the propagation of the gospel, were not equally consigned to writing by the penman of the sacred story, this, we must say, entirely depended on the divine pleasure and determination.

³ 'It shall come to pass in the last days,' says the prophet Isaiah, speaking of the times of the gospel, 'that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow into it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up into the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.'² So that, in conformity to this prediction, the divine Providence thought fit, that no more account should be given of the first plantation of Christianity in the world, than what concerned Judea, and the neighbouring countries, or, at farthest, the most eminent places of the Roman empire. We perhaps may think, that a more particular relation of all that the apostles did, in the several countries where they travelled, had been more satisfactory to an inquisitive mind; but then we should remember,⁴ that this would have swelled the holy volumes into too great a bulk, and so have rendered them less serviceable and accommodated to the ordinary use of Christians. All that was proper to be done upon this occasion therefore was, to single out some few persons who made the most eminent figure in the infancy of the church, and to represent their particular labours and sufferings in the propagation of Christianity, as a specimen of all the rest.

That St Peter and St Paul were characters of this kind, none can deny; and therefore St Luke is not to be blamed in making choice of them. That he pursued the history of St Peter no farther, must be imputed to his adjoining himself to St Paul, whose constant attendant he then became, an eye-witness of the whole carriage of his life, and privy to his most intimate transactions; and therefore we find him more copious upon this subject than any other. But why he did not finish his whole life, an ancient Arabic writer, cited by⁵ Kirstenius, has given us this reason, that after St Paul's imprisonment, and departure from Rome, St Luke, who was left behind as his deputy to supply his place, was, in a short time, put to death; otherwise, says our author, he would have doubtless continued the history of the apostles' Acts.^c c These reasons are by no means satisfactory. They might be very applicable to the case of a profane historian, who is guided by mere human motives, and governed by ordinary events, but they cannot be admitted in the case of the sacred historian, otherwise we shall lower the standard of revelation. If the divine inspiration of the Acts of the Apostles be admitted—and it rests on the same grounds as that of any other portion of Scripture—it follows that this book contains such a history of the apostles, as the Almighty saw to be necessary and sufficient for our instruction and profit: and although it is proper for us to inquire into its scope and design, and in what respects it is calculated to promote our spiritual edification, we must at the same time consider, that we are altogether incompetent judges as to what particulars should have been given, and what withheld. God alone is sufficient for these things.—Ed.

³ Isa. ii. 2, 3.

⁴ Cave's Life of St Andrew.

⁵ Vit. quat. Evang. p. 15.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Without laying any stress then upon the testimony of the a Apocryphal Acts of the apostles, which it must be owned are generally full of fable and romance, we may venture to affirm, that this one composition of St Luke is sufficient to answer all the purposes for which we can desire such a history. For what is it that we may reasonably expect in a work of this kind, but that it should, by a plain relation of facts, confirm our faith in the gospel; show the accomplishment of the promises and predictions which Christ, the founder of our religion, has made to his disciples: and give us some competent knowledge of the settlement of that religion, by what methods it grew, and spread to places remote from its first plantation, what was the fate and behaviour of some of its first professors, and what the tenor of their doctrines and discourses: but that St Luke's history, in all these particulars, has sufficiently acquitted itself, none that has read it with the least observation can deny.

St Peter, no doubt, was an eminent apostle, and accordingly makes a distinguished figure in the sacred story; but his being at Rome is a point that we cannot expect from St Luke, because his account of things expires some time before our apostle came thither. Some writers indeed, of the Roman communion, place his first coming to Rome in the year of our Lord 44, which was the second of Claudius: but if we consider, that in the epistle which St Paul, towards the latter end of the reign of Claudius, wrote to the Romans, wherein he spends the greatest part of one chapter in saluting the particular persons that were then at Rome, he never once makes mention of St Peter; and how, in that epistle, he expresses his earnest desire of coming thither, that he might ¹ 'impart unto them some spiritual gifts, to the end that they might be established in the faith,' for which there could be no apparent reason, had St Peter been there so long before him: if we consider, that when St Paul, not many years after, that is, about the second of Nero, was sent prisoner to Rome, among all the brethren ² that came to meet him, as far as Appii-forum and the Three Taverns, we hear not a word of St Peter; and yet we cannot but think, that had he been then at Rome, a The impostor who composed these Acts, which were supposed to have been written by Abdias, gives himself out to have been a bishop, ordained at Babylon by the apostles themselves, when they were upon their journey into Persia. The work is neither ancient nor authentic. It was known neither to Eusebius nor St Jerom, nor any of the fathers that lived before them; and yet, according to the author, who says that he wrote it in Greek, it contains in substance, 1st, The Acts of St Peter, or according to its present title, the Recognitions of St Clement; a work stuffed with such visions and fables, as must come originally from the Ebionites. 2dly, The Acts of St Paul, which pretends to be a continuation of that apostle's history, from the second year of his first voyage to Rome to the end of his life. 3dly, The Acts of St John the Evangelist, which, though mentioned by Epiphanius and St Austin, contains incredible stories of this apostle. 4thly, The Acts of St Andrew, mentioned by St Austin, and received by the Manichees, but different from that which we have at present under the name of 'The Priests of Achaia.' 5thly, The Acts of St Thomas, mentioned by the same father, and received by the same heretics, as containing that apostle's travels into India, and the sufferings which he there underwent. 6thly, The Acts of St Matthias, wrote originally in Hebrew, but what critics will not allow to be genuine. And, 7thly, The Acts of St Philip, which, as well as the gospel that goes under his name, was held in great esteem by the Gnostics.—Calmet's Dictionary and Preface to the Acts of the Apostles.

¹ Rom. i. 11, 12.

² Acts xxviii. 15.

he would have come at the head of the company to receive a brother apostle in chains; and that with him St Paul would have chosen rather to sojourn, than ³ to dwell by himself in his own hired house: if we consider, that in the several epistles which St Paul wrote from Rome, there is not the least mention of St Peter; that in that to the Colossians in particular, he tells them plainly, that of all the Jews at Rome, he had no ⁴ fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God which had been a comfort unto him save Aristarchus, Marcus, and Jesus, who was called Justus, which evidently excludes St Peter; and, in that to Timothy, complains, that ⁵ at his first answer at Rome, no man stood with him, but all forsook him, which we can hardly believe St Peter would have done, had he then been there: nay, if we consider, that in the same epistle he tells Timothy, that ⁶ Luke was the only person that was with him; that Crescens was gone to one place, Titus to another, and Tychicus to another, we cannot imagine either that St Peter at that time was at Rome, or that he had lately gone from thence; since, had it been so, St Paul, no doubt, would have taken notice of him, as well as of the rest; unless we may suppose, that he was a person so inconsiderable, as not to be worthy the remembering, and his errand of so small importance, as not to deserve a place in St Paul's account, as well as that of Crescens to Galatia, and Titus to Dalmatia.

Upon the whole therefore we may conclude, that at the time when St Paul was first at Rome, no footsteps are to be found of St Peter's having been there; and yet, notwithstanding this, to deny that he was ever there at all, is ⁷ to oppose the current of all antiquity, and the unanimous consent of persons of great eminence and authority, who lived near enough the times of the apostles, to know the truth and certainty of what they reported, and who have told us, that Peter baptized in Tiber, as John the Baptist did in the river Jordan; that in the days of Nero he was crucified; that the church of Rome was happy in having its doctrines sealed with apostolic blood; and that the two glorious apostles Peter and Paul, having founded and constituted this church, delivered the care of it over unto Linus: for we must observe, that, whenever the ancients speak of the bishops of Rome, and the first originals of that church, they equally attribute the foundation and government of it to Peter and Paul, making the one as much concerned in it as the other. In short, no one that has any reverence for antiquity can deny that St Peter was at Rome: but then it is highly probable, that he came not thither, till some few years before his death; that there he joined with St Paul in preaching the gospel, and that both there sealed the testimony of it with their blood.

The design of St Stephen's speech to the Jews is apparently this,—to answer the charge of blasphemy against him, for having spoken somewhat slightly of the perpetual duration of their temple, and the obligation of the ceremonial law; and this he does by showing that the law, for which at this time they expressed so fierce a zeal, as if salvation could be attained no other way, could not possibly be of that weighty consequence, and absolute necessity, as they imagined.

1st. ⁸ Because it appears from the history of Abraham,

³ Ver. 30. ⁴ Col. iv. 10, 11. ⁵ 2 Tim. iv. 16. ⁶ Ver. 11, 12.

⁷ Vid. Cave's Life of St Peter.

⁸ Acts vii. 2—37.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACT'S I. 10. TO THE END.

and the patriarchs, that their ancestors pleased, and continued in the favour of God, for more than four hundred years without it; and therefore, since these were God's peculiar and elect, before the law was given, this law could not be the only covenant and dispensation for the salvation of mankind, exclusive of all others.

2dly. ¹ Because the very prophet, at whose hands they received the law, gave them warning of another eminent prophet, whom God, in ages to come, would raise up from among them, like unto him, that is, a lawgiver too, to whom every soul among them was commanded, upon pain of utter excision, to yield attention and obedience; and that consequently, preaching the faith and obedience of Jesus, who was that very prophet, could not be blasphemy against God, or Moses.

3dly. ² Because the law, for which they now pretended so great a reverence, was plainly insufficient to contain them in their duty, as appeared from their frequent relapses into rebellion and idolatry, which the prophets sharply reproached them with, and threatened with so many severe punishments; and therefore as the ancient prophets thought it no profanation either of the law or the temple, to denounce the abolishing of the one, and the demolishing of the other; so was it none in him to declare the abrogation of the former, and the utter ruin of the latter, to a generation of men now ripe for destruction.

This is the substance of St Stephen's speech; which is far from being incongruous, or immethodical; though, had he been permitted to bring it to a conclusion, as it is plain it was interrupted by the noise and clamour of the rabble, it might have appeared to a better advantage. This however must be said in vindication of what are supposed to be errors in it,—1st, ³ That Terah might die in Charrau, before his son Abraham removed into Canaan. For though it is said, that ⁴ at seventy years of age he begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran, yet it does not therefore follow, that Abraham was the eldest of these. It is not the eldest, but the worthiest, that is frequently first named in holy writ; for, that Haran, who is last named, was considerably older than Abraham, is evident from Abraham's marrying his daughter, who was only ten years younger than himself. And therefore, if we do but suppose, that sixty years after that Terah began to beget children, he begat Abraham, the father will be two hundred and five years old ⁵ at which time he died, when the son was no more than seventy-five, at which time he removed into Canaan.—2dly, ⁶ That though there be a difference between Moses and St Stephen, in the number of those who went down with Jacob into Egypt, yet this only arises from the different designs of the two accountants. For the design of Moses is, to tell us how many Jacob and his offspring amounted to, omitting his sons' wives; that of St Stephen, how many all the kindred were, whom Joseph called into Egypt. In the light that Moses considers them, they were seventy, but then several of these must be left out of St Stephen's number, namely, Joseph and his two sons, who were in Egypt already, Hezron, and Hamul, who were not yet born, and Jacob, whom he reckons apart. Now take out these six from the seventy, and there will remain sixty-four, which, by adding the eleven wives of Jacob's sons, are just seventy-five. ^a—3dly, That St Stephen no where insinuates, that Jacob was buried in Sychem; for his words are, ⁷ 'so Jacob went down into Egypt, and there died, he, and our fathers, and were carried,' that is, our fathers were carried, over into Sychem: ⁸ For if Joseph desired to have his bones carried into the land of Canaan, there to be interred, there is reason to believe that the other fathers desired the same, as having the same faith in the promises, and the same interest in the land, that Joseph had; and that if they did desire the same, the rest of the tribes, bearing the same honour to their patriarchs that the tribe of Joseph did to him, would think themselves equally concerned to preserve their bones, in order to be carried out of Egypt with them, and to be buried together with Joseph's bones, as not improbably they were, at Sychem, though the remains of Jacob might be laid in another place.^b

It is a deference, I think, which we owe to the Spirit of God, whenever we find an opposition between sacred and profane authors, that cannot be well reconciled, to impute the error or mistake to the latter; now, the Jewish historian Josephus tells us of one Theudas, who, in the fourth year of Claudius, set up for a great prophet and worker of miracles, but was soon routed and destroyed by Caspius Fadus, the Roman governor; and St Luke, as he represents the sentiments of Gamaliel, tells us of one of the same name who arose in the reign of Augustus, and some time before the insurrection of Judas the Gaulonite, which happened upon account of the taxation, when Cyrenius was governor of Syria. But why should we account both these, who were so widely distant in point of time, to be one and the same person? Instead of charging Gamaliel, or rather St Luke, with a lapse of memory in this piece of chronology, it is more reasonable to think, ⁹ that the Theudas of Josephus, and that of Gamaliel, were two men, but not unlikely father and son, or tutor and scholar; and that this name was given to the latter Theudas, even as parents call their own children by their names, or that he himself assumed it, in imitation of the former Theudas, whom he delighted to follow in his appellation, as well as his enthusiastic folly. To this purpose Origen informs us, that, having gathered from the Scriptures, that the time of the Messiah was come, first Theudas, and after him

⁷ Acts vii. 15. 16.⁸ Kidder's Ibid. p. 89. and Whitby's

Annot. in locum.

Commentary in locum.

⁹ Whitby's Annotations, and Calmet's

^a This view of the subject is clearly supported by Dr Hales, Analyses, vol. ii. p. 144, 2d edition, to which the reader is referred. The New Testament has furnished an admirable commentary on the Old.—Ed.

^b What Abraham bought was the cave and field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, and he purchased it from the children of Heth, (Gen. xxiii. 3, 10, 17. l. 13.); but the sepulchre at Sychem, where the bones of Joseph, and as it seems, of the other patriarchs, were laid, was bought by Jacob from the children of Hamor, or Emmor, (Gen. xxxiii. 19. : Josh. xxiv. 32. : John iv. 5.) it is plain, therefore, that Abraham is inserted in the text by some mistake of the copyists, instead of Jacob, and that the true reading is, 'the bones of our fathers were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre that Jacob bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem.—Holden's Expositor.—Ed.

¹ Acts vii. 37, 38.² Ibid. 39—50.³ Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part 2. p. 85.⁴ Gen. xi. 26.⁵ Ibid. ver. 22.⁶ Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part 2. p. 86.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 93; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Judas of Galilee, raised tumults in the time of the taxing; and therefore the fathers unanimously say, that those words of our Saviour, 'all that came before me are thieves and robbers,' do relate to these two, Theudas and Judas of Galilee. So extremely evident it is, that the ancient fathers agreed in this, namely, That there was a Theudas, pretending to great matters, even before the coming of our Lord, though his insurrection was so trifling, having but ¹ about four hundred men, who joined him, that the Jewish historian has taken no notice of it.

Another concession, that I think we may fairly claim in behalf of the sacred penmen, is, that the same licence of expression which profane writers make so much use of, may sometimes be allowed them; which will quite destroy the objection against the hyperbolic phrase in St Luke, of ² 'Jews residing at Jerusalem, out of every nation under heaven;' though, upon a short inquiry into the several dispersions of that people, we may be able in some measure to vindicate the truth of it, even in the very letter.

To this purpose we may observe, that before their final dispersion by the Romans, the Jews had suffered two captivities, or great dispersions, besides some smaller scatterings. The first was of the ten tribes of Israel by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, who is said to have carried them away, ³ and planted them in Halah, and Habor, and in the cities of the Medes; and as these never returned to dwell in their own country, they are the Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, that is, the Persians of the province of Elymais, whom St Luke ⁴ in his subsequent enumeration intends. The second captivity was by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, when he carried away the other two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and ⁵ placed them in Babylon, and other of his territories. Now, though a good part of these, at the end of seventy years, returned from their captivity; yet great numbers of them, finding themselves happily situated under princes who indulged them a free exercise of their religion, never visited their native country, except it was at some of their great annual festivals; and of the number of these we may suppose those to be whom St Luke calls ⁶ 'the dwellers in Mesopotamia.' Besides these two great dispersions, there happened a third in the days of Ptolemy Soter, ⁷ who surprised the city of Jerusalem, and carrying away above an hundred thousand of its inhabitants, placed them in his garrisoned cities, and other places dependent on Alexandria.

Now from these three principal dispersions did proceed those lesser scatterings in all parts of the Roman empire and elsewhere. From that of Babylon and Mesopotamia, sprang those ⁸ of Cappadocia, Pontus, Phrygia, Pamphylia, and other parts of Asia Minor; and from that of Egypt and Alexandria were derived those of Libya, Cyrene, and all other Hellenists whatever, in the several parts of the Roman empire. Add to all this the many natives of Judea itself, who, upon one occasion or other, chose to live among the Gentiles, and more especially at Rome, which was then the metropolis of the whole world; and from hence might proceed ⁹ 'those strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, Cretes and Arabians,' whom the apostles in like manner enumerate.

Agrippa, we read in his speech to the Jews, dissuading them from rebelling against the Romans, for fear of bringing a sad calamity, not upon themselves only, but upon the whole nation, wherever dispersed among the Gentiles, hesitates not to say, that ¹⁰ there was no people in the world who had not some of their nation dwelling among them; and therefore we need less wonder that we find the sacred history asserting, that Jews of every nation under heaven were at this time met at Jerusalem, when ¹¹ not only a great festival, in which all their males were to appear before God, summoned them thither; but their earnest expectation likewise of the promised Messiah, whose time of coming, according to the prediction of their prophets, was now accomplished, might make them more desirous to return to their native country, there, with an holy impatience, to wait for the consolation of Israel.

¹² What makes it very difficult to give a distinct account of the offices and orders of the Christian ministers in the apostolic age, is the shortness of the historical part of the New Testament, which seldom extends farther than the first plantation of churches; and the design of the epistolary part, which, being written to persons lately converted to Christianity, was to acquaint them with the principles of their religion, and to arm them against false teachers, rather than instruct them in the form of church government. However, by a due attention to what we read, we may observe, That the apostles were the first, and most distinguished of our blessed Lord's disciples, chosen by him to be his more immediate attendants, and, in the course of his ministry, admitted to a greater confidence and familiarity than the rest: that upon his leaving the world, he commanded them to testify the truth of his resurrection and ascension, and to publish the doctrines and mysteries of the gospel in all nations, and at the same time gave them authority to govern the churches which they should establish everywhere: ¹³ that, to enable them to discharge their weighty offices, they were endued with superior courage, and gifts extraordinary, that what they had in their instructions, they might publish and testify to the greatest audience, and in the times of greatest danger: that having by this means spread the Christian religion far and wide, they settled churches in the several places where they had made a sufficient number of converts, with proper ministers to attend the offices of religion, while themselves proceeded in the great affair of propagating the gospel in other countries: ¹⁴ that in the churches which they thus had founded, they retained the chief authority, and had all other ministers, of what quality soever, subject to them; as appears from St Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus, indited in a style which sufficiently speaks a superiority over them: and that, in virtue of their commission from Christ, they exercised a power of making such laws and constitutions as were found necessary for the good government of the church; or enforcing these laws with such penalties as the nature of ¹⁰ Joseph. on the Jewish War, b. ii. c. 16.

¹¹ Beausobre's Annotations in locum.

¹² Archbishop Potter's Discourse on church government.

¹³ Miscellanea sacra, Essay ii.

¹⁴ Archbishop Potter on Church Government.

¹ Acts v. 36. ² Acts ii. 5. ³ 2 Kings xvii. 6.

⁴ Acts ii. 9. ⁵ 2 Kings xxiv. 16. ⁶ Acts ii. 19.

⁷ Joseph. Antiq. b. 12. c. 2. ⁸ Acts ii. 9, 10. ⁹ Ibid. ii. 11.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98 ; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

transgressions required ; of ejecting the incorrigible from the communion of the saints ; of pardoning and receiving the penitent ; of conferring the gifts of the Holy Ghost ; of choosing proper persons to administer in holy offices ; and of appointing their successors to rule and preside in the church.

This is the most of what we learn concerning the apostles, and their distinct offices : and in relation to the inferior ministers of the Christian church, we may observe, that upon the departure of the apostles from Jerusalem, if not much sooner, St James, the near relation of our Lord, was made the fixed bishop of that city, and under him had seven deacons, who were solemnly ordained by the apostles : that in the churches of Ephesus and Crete, St Paul gives Timothy and Titus plain rules for their conduct in the ordination of bishops and deacons ; so that Timothy and Titus must have been bishops themselves, otherwise they could not have ordained others to that office : that though the words bishop and elder ^a be used promiscuously, and are sometimes applied to the same persons, as St John calls himself an elder, though at the same time he was sovereign bishop of Asia ; yet this he might do upon different considerations, since an elder he might be with regard to his age, and a bishop with regard to his office : and that bishops were officers in the Christian church, appointed by the apostles to be their successors in the government of it, and, in their absence or upon their demise, to exercise the same functions, as it was in the case of Timothy and Titus : that the elders, supposing them distinct from bishops, were those who had been with Christ from the beginning, and having received the Holy Ghost at the same time that the apostles did, were sometimes chosen into their number, as were Matthias and Barnabas, and, upon account of their extraordinary gifts, though they were not fixed ministers, had a right to officiate wherever they came, a share in the government of the church, and a seat in all their councils and synods : that in the great variety of gifts which Christ bestowed upon his church, some of these elders, very probably, were prophets, whose principal work it was, by expounding the prophecies of the Old Testament, and foretelling future events, to convince the Jews ; and others evangelists, who, by writing the gospel by inspiration, and preaching it to infidels, who never heard of it, made it their business to convert the Gentiles ; that though in some churches, when first established, we find only a bishop and his deacons, without any mention of the intermediate order of presbyters ; yet, when the number of Christians increased, the bishop ordained others to officiate in the congregations, where he could not be present, and to assist him in the other parts of his pastoral charge ; and were, at that time, called ' teachers,' and afterwards ' presbyters,' or priests : that these presbyters were a settled order in the church, superior to deacons, but, in the matter of ordination and confirmation by the imposition of hands, inferior to bishops, though, in all other respects, their equals, and alike empowered to dispense the word, administer the sacraments, and offer up the prayers of the people : that deacons, as their very name imports, were persons appointed to attend on the bishops, and according to the original institution of their order, to take care of the poor, that is, to inquire into the necessities of every one, and to apply a suitable relief to them out of the church's treasure, though from the examples of St Philip and Stephen, we find, that their employment likewise was to baptize converts and children, and to preach the gospel to the adult ; and that the brethren were properly what we now call the laity of the church, but then, as the laity at that time were endued with special gifts, by these they were entitled to have some share in the administration of the church ; were present with the apostles and elders at the council of Jerusalem ; and had leave given them to choose proper persons out of their body, and to present these to the apostles, while they were alive, and afterwards to the bishops, but had no power at all of their own accord to ordain or appoint them to any sacred office : we may observe, I say, that such were the several orders of men in the beginning of the Christian church, such the diversities of their gifts, and such the differences of their administrations. But as it must be owned, that several of these were extraordinary persons, and continued no longer than the apostolic age ; so to have a full and distinct account of such standing officers as were to abide for ever, we must have recourse to the testimony of antiquity ; which perfectly agrees in this, — ' That after the apostles' days, they were no other than bishops, presbyters, and deacons ; and accordingly Ignatius, to mention one evidence for all, after he had been forty years bishop of Antioch, to which dignity he was promoted by the hands of Peter the apostle, and therefore cannot be supposed to be ignorant of the state of the primitive church, in his exhortation to the people to be obedient to the ministers of it, tells us of the bishop presiding in the place of God ; the presbyters as the council of the apostles; and the deacons as the ministers of Christ; and therefore, says he, he that is within the altar, is pure; but whoever does any thing without the bishop, the college of presbyters, and the deacons, his conscience is defiled; and therefore, says he again, adhere to the bishop, the college of presbyters, and the deacons? A sufficient attestation that these were the standing ministers of the Christian church in those days.

^a Allowing it to be true, that these names in Scripture are used promiscuously, which yet is by very learned men, and upon very good authority, denied ; yet still this is no proof that presbyters must be advanced to the dignity of bishops or bishops sunk to the level of presbyters. For although the term presbyter is at present used to denote the office of those who assist the bishop, and are subject to him in discharging some of the ministerial functions ; yet in the days of the apostles, the bishops might be called presbyters, though they had then other presbyters subject to them. For though all presbyters are not bishops, yet all bishops are presbyters ; although the former may not perform the functions of the latter, the latter may perform the functions of the former ; what offices are incumbent upon a presbyter, those a bishop has a right to perform, and may therefore, upon that account, very justly be called a presbyter. It is allowed on all hands, that under the Jewish dispensation, there were three orders of ecclesiastical persons, the high-priest, the priests, and the Levites ; and yet in the first institution of these orders, the word priest is used promiscuously, as well of the high-priest, as of the inferior priests ; so that Aaron himself, the first high-priest, in the book of Moses, is never dignified with any higher character than that of a priest. But who ever, from this promiscuous use of his name, has attempted to prove, that all the priests were equal to the high-priest ? or that the sons of Aaron were of the same dignity and order with Aaron the father ? And yet this is the main argument which the contenders for a parity among the presbyters make use of to prove their assertion, namely, that because in the writings of the apostles, bishops are sometimes, according to the opinion of some interpreters, called presbyters, bishops and presbyters were therefore both of one order. But if being called by the same name makes an equality in ministerial functions, our Saviour, who is termed an apostle, (Heb. iii. 1.) a bishop or pastor, (1 Pet. ii. 25.) a master or doctor, (Mat. xxiii. 10.) a minister or deacon, (Rom. xv. 8.) must, by this form of reasoning, be degraded to an equality with the apostles, with bishops, with masters, nay, even with deacons themselves ; which is not only incongruous but impious to assert. — Bishop Smalldridge's Sermons, p. 111.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

That Timothy and Titus were bishops of Ephesus and Crete, and both such by the appointment of the apostle St Paul, we have the testimony of all antiquity to convince us; but if by saying that they were bishops, we mean, that they took upon them these churches or dioceses, as their fixed and peculiar charge, in which they were to preside for term of life, we are much mistaken. Upon St Paul's going to Macedonia,¹ he exhorts Timothy to abide at Ephesus, in order to correct several abuses; and yet,² in his second epistle, we find him intreating him to come to Rome, where he continued, as the ancients conjecture, to the time of the apostle's martyrdom. In like manner St Paul³ left Titus in Crete, to ordain elders in every city, and to set in order the things that were wanting; but no sooner had he done this than he sent for him, the very next year, to Nicopolis; and, having sent Artemas to supply his place, took him along with him to Rome, and then sent him into Dalmatia, upon the great affair of propagating the gospel, till at length, after the apostle's death, he returned again to Crete.

The truth is, these two persons were not only bishops, but evangelists likewise, and the work of an evangelist, as Eusebius informs us, was this,—To lay the foundation of the faith in barbarous nations, to constitute in them pastors, and having committed to them the cultivating of these new plantations, to pass on to other countries and nations; so that according to this, these two evangelists were not in a condition to reside in their respective dioceses. But still, if by bishops we only understand persons who had authority to ordain and govern the clergy of their provinces, and to exercise acts of discipline and censure over ecclesiastics, as well as private Christians, we cannot but think, that when we find⁴ Timothy set over the house of God, and in that house empowered⁵ to make rules for the orderly celebration of divine worship; to see that teachers⁶ taught no other doctrine than what they had received from our Lord and his disciples; to commit the doctrine of the gospel⁷ to faithful men, who should be able to teach others; and to ordain those whom he should find to be qualified,⁸ some to be bishops, and others deacons; when we find him authorised⁹ to provide for the competent maintenance, and all due respect of church-officers; to take cognizance of accusations,¹⁰ even against elders; to¹¹ rebuke publicly those that sin; and to inflict censures, proportionable to the crimes that are proved against them; and when we find Titus, in like manner, authorized to teach all degrees of men, and¹² to exhort and rebuke them with all authority; and take cognizance of heretics; and such as did not repent¹³ upon the second admonition, to reject from the communion of saints;¹⁴ to set in order what St Paul had left unfinished; and to ordain those whom himself should approve, to be bishops and elders; we cannot but think, I say, that, to all intents and purposes, they were bishops, and had the several parts of the apostolic authority committed to them, though in this they differed from such settled diocesan bishops as are among us, that the frequent calls of their evangelical office obliged them to be oftentimes absent from their charge.

St Paul, speaking of himself and his doctrine, has these remarkable words: 'I¹⁵ certify to you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me, is not of man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.' And therefore he styles himself, 'an¹⁶apostle, not of men, neither by man.' Let us then observe a little, when it was that Jesus Christ vouchsafed him the revelation which he here speaks of, and then we may possibly find out the time when he first commenced an apostle. At his first conversion near Damascus, he saw a great light, and heard a voice issuing from heaven; but it does not appear, that at this time he had any sight of Christ, or received any revelation from him, except¹⁷ that he should go to Damascus, where it should be told him what was appointed for him to do. In Damascus indeed, Ananias told him, that God had chosen him,¹⁸ 'to know his will, and to see that just One, and to hear the voice of his mouth, and¹⁹ to carry his name to the Gentiles;' but this is rather a declaration of what was revealed to Ananias, than any designation of Saul to the apostleship. Encouraged, however, by this notification from Ananias, and the inspiration which he received by the imposition of his hands, he began to preach in the name of Christ, and continued to do so for full three years with great eloquence and strength of argument; but so far was all this from gaining him the character of an apostle, that, when he came to Jerusalem the first time after his conversion,²⁰ the brethren would not believe that he was so much as a disciple. It is no improbable opinion therefore,²¹ that it was at the second time of his coming up to Jerusalem, when, as himself relates the matter, while he was praying in the temple, he fell into a trance, and saw Jesus Christ saying unto him,²² 'Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem; for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me, and therefore depart; for I will send thee far hence to the Gentiles:' It was at this time, I say, that he not only received his commission to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, but the revelation of²³ the gospel, likewise which he was to preach, and the designation of the very person that was to accompany him.

That he received such a revelation,²⁴ wherein God made known unto him the mystery which, in other ages, was not known unto the sons of men, namely, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel, himself testifies; and yet we have no clear account of any other interview between Christ and him, than what

¹ 1 Tim. i. 3. ² 2 Tim. iv. 9. ³ Tit. i. 5.
⁴ 1 Tim. iii. 15. ⁵ Ibid. ii. 1. ⁶ Ibid. i. 2. ⁷ 2 Tim. ii. 2.
⁸ 1 Tim. iii. 1, 2, &c. ⁹ Ibid. v. 17. ¹⁰ Ibid. ver. 19.
¹¹ Ibid. ver. 20. ¹² Tit. ii. 15. ¹³ Ibid. iii. 10.

¹⁴ Ibid. i. 5, 6. ¹⁵ Gal. i. 11, 12. ¹⁶ Ibid. i. 1.
¹⁷ Acts ix. 6. xxii. 10. ¹⁸ Ibid. xxii. 14. ¹⁹ Ibid. ix. 15.
²⁰ Ibid. 26. ²¹ Miscel. Sac. Essay 3. ²² Acts xxii. 18. 21.
²³ Philip ii. 2. ²⁴ Ephes. iii. &c.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

happened here in the temple, upon his second coming to Jerusalem. Being thus furnished with a proper revelation, and a fellow-labourer to assist him in the propagation of it, he and Barnabas returned unto Antioch, where the Holy Ghost soon ordered the church¹ to separate them for the work whereunto he had called them, namely, in the vision which he vouchsafed Saul in the temple, when he was last at Jerusalem; and, accordingly, the church² fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, having recommended them to the grace of God, and sent them away; and they, being thus sent forth by the Holy Ghost, proceeded to the work of their ministry with great cheerfulness and unanimity, until, by their second peregrination, a certain disagreement happened, which produced a separation between them.

It may not be amiss however to observe, that the design of the Holy Ghost, in having this their perverseness recorded, was, not only to testify the truth and sincerity of the apostolic history, which is not afraid to relate the faults and failings of its chief personages, whatever construction may be put upon them; but to show us likewise, that the best Christians are subject to the same passions and infirmities with other men; and that therefore none ought to be too much elated with an opinion of their own piety, or to despise others, whom they may imagine their inferiors. Nor must it be forgotten, that this benefit in particular accrued to St Mark, who was the subject of their contention, namely, that the positiveness of St Paul not to take him in company, who, in their former journey, had so shamefully deserted them, made him more constant and resolved in the service of the church for the time to come, and gave the church this advantage, as we hinted before,³ that, by means of the separation of two such eminent apostles, more people were converted, and a greater number of provinces, than otherwise would have been, visited with the glorious light of the gospel.

The like benefit accrued to the church from the divine severity to Ananias, and his wife Sapphira: for it was not any sentence of St Peter that destroyed them, but the righteous judgment of God in punishing the hypocrisy, the covetousness, the sacrilege, and gross impiety, wherewith their crime was aggravated. The custom in those times was,⁴ for as many as were possessors of lands to sell them, and to bring the prices of the things that were sold, and to lay them down at the apostles' feet, that distribution might be made unto every man according as he had need. This charitable disposition among believers Ananias and his wife made use of, to obtain a false reputation, and to pass a cheat upon the apostles if they could. To this purpose, they gave it out that they had devoted all their possessions, which perhaps were very large, to the use of the church, and accordingly sold them. 'This,' say they, 'will gain us the credit of being very charitable and religious persons; will make us be highly respected by the apostles, and in a manner idolized among the brethren. We purpose, however, not to give away our all upon this occasion, though we may pretend we do so; but will reserve a good portion to ourselves; and, if we keep but our own counsel, who will find it out? The apostles indeed are persons endued with great gifts, but⁵ what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him? It is impossible for them to pry into our hearts: and therefore, if we blab it not ourselves, we may, by this means, put out our money to good interest, and, by laying down a part of the price at the apostles' feet, as others have done the whole, be entitled to the same right of relief from the public stock which others who have parted with their all are admitted to, and, at the same time, retain a comfortable subsistence for ourselves. All that we have to do then is, to be steadfast and uniform in our story, and then we may defy the Spirit of God itself, which the apostles make such boast of, to detect us.'

This seems to be a natural comment upon their contrivance and conspiracy; and if so,⁶ the Jews, who are apt to object against Christians the severity of what they suffered, would do well to remember, that the law of Moses allowed of no atonement for wilful sacrilege, but⁷ left the delinquent to be cut off by the hand of heaven, as Ananias here was. Nor should it be forgotten,⁸ that as we find God, under the law, more severe in his punishment of those who first offended in offering strange fire, as in the case of Nadab and Abihu, and violated the sabbath, as in the case of the man who gathered sticks on that day, and especially against those who rose up against Moses the prophet, and Aaron the priest of the Lord, as in the case of Korah and his company, there is the like reason, that the first great offence of this kind, under the gospel dispensation, should receive exemplary punishment from the hand of God, that others might stand in more terror of those sins which thus affronted that Holy Ghost by whose power the Christian religion began now to be propagated; for so the text tells us,⁹ 'that great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things, and believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women.'

St Paul, speaking of his own easy compliance to the several tempers and humours of those with whom he conversed,¹⁰ 'though I be free from all men,' says he, 'yet have I made myself a servant unto all, that I might gain the more. Unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews: to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; to them that are without the law, as without the law, that I might gain them that are without the law. To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. And this I do for the gospel's sake.' And doubtless for the gospel's sake it was, that he appointed Timothy to be circumcised. He knew full well the prejudices which the Jews had conceived against persons who had not submitted to that ordinance; that they would not suffer them to appear, much less to argue and discourse in any of their synagogues: and therefore, being determined to take Timothy for the companion of his travels, to make his access more easy to the Jews, and himself a fitter instrument in their conversion, he thought proper to give him this passport, as it were.¹¹ 'Circumcision,' he knew, 'was nothing, and uncircumcision

¹ Acts xiii. 2. ² Ibid. 3, 4. ³ Vid. p. 1075, in the notes.
⁴ Acts iv. 34, 35.

⁵ 1 Cor. ii. 11. ⁶ Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part 2. p. 85. ⁷ Josh. vii. 18. ⁸ Whitty's Annotations on Acts v. 1. ⁹ Whitty's Annotations on Acts v. 11, 14.
¹⁰ 1 Cor. ix. 19, &c. ¹¹ 1 Cor. vii. 19.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

was nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God.¹ In its own nature it was a thing indifferent, neither required by the Christian religion, nor inconsistent with it; and under this consideration he was willing it should pass upon Timothy: but when it came to be required as a duty, and a duty necessary to salvation; to be used as the distinguishing mark of a Jew, in opposition to Christians; to be made an obligation to the total observance of the law, and a rock of offence to those of a different persuasion; it then became evil, and inconsistent with the doctrine of the gospel. Under this sense it is, that St Paul so frequently and so loudly declaims against it: and upon these considerations it was, that he would not allow Titus to be circumcised, notwithstanding the earnest importunity of some people of reputation at Jerusalem.

² With what a jealous eye St Paul was looked upon by all Judaizing Christians, as a person averse to the Mosaic institutions, is sufficiently known. These men had been at Antioch, where, having insidiously watched the liberty which he took in omitting all legal observances, they, when he came to Jerusalem, informed the church against him, that he preached to the Gentiles, who were not circumcised; that he conversed freely and familiarly with them; that Titus, who was a Greek, was at that time with him; and therefore, to put the matter upon an issue, they urged, that this intimate friend of his might be circumcised. Their policy in this was visible. Had they carried their point against St Paul, they would soon have informed the church of Antioch, that, by the order of the council at Jerusalem,³ Titus had been obliged to be circumcised; and this, besides the defeat given to the apostle, and baffle to his doctrine of Christian liberty, would have proved a great scandal and discouragement to the heathen converts, and an impediment to the progress of the gospel, which at that time began to be more successful among the Gentiles than the Jews. And therefore St Paul was resolute, and took special care, that Titus should not be circumcised. So that, upon the whole, it appears, that St Paul was no ways inconsistent with himself, though he varied his conduct, according to the different circumstances he found himself under. He ordered Timothy, whose mother was a Jewess, to be circumcised, because his circumcision would be a means to forward his ministry, and to gain him an easier access to the Jews; but he refused to have Titus, who was a Gentile, circumcised, because his circumcision would have been a means to scandalize the brethren, to alienate their minds from the Christian faith, and a great obstruction to the course of the gospel. In short,⁴ Titus he would not suffer to be circumcised, thereby to show, that circumcision was not necessary; but Timothy he allowed to be circumcised, that, by his practise, it might appear, that such ceremonies were not evil in themselves, but might be used without any crime, until by degrees they came to be abolished.

The like may be said of his own compliance with certain ceremonies of purification, at the request of St James, and the other elders at Jerusalem, and for the satisfaction of the Jewish converts there.⁵ 'Thou seest, brother,' say they, 'how many thousands of Jews there are who believe, and they are all zealous for the observance of the law.' The law of Moses was held in so great veneration, as being the contrivance of God himself,⁶ 'ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator,' ratified by miracles, and entertained by all their forefathers, as the peculiar prerogative of their nation for so many generations, that even those who by the evidence of the gospel were prevailed upon to embrace Christianity, could not overcome the prejudice of education, but still continued their adherence to those legal rites and customs wherein they had been brought up. Some of them indeed were for obtruding them upon the Gentile converts, but the most moderate of them all, even bishops and elders as well as the laity, were for a punctual observation of them among the Jewish: they were convinced, that these institutions were of divine original: they knew of no revelation made by God, that they were to cease after the death of the Messiah: our blessed Saviour, in his gospel, had said little or nothing of them; nay, in saying, 'that he came not to destroy the law and the prophets,' he seems to have given a fresh sanction to them; and because he foreknew, that the destruction of their temple, and their exclusion from their own land, would in a short time make it impossible for them to observe them, he had given none of the apostles, except it was St Paul, any intimations concerning them; and therefore it is not to be wondered, that men, in these circumstances, should advise St Paul, for the good of so many thousand souls as might otherwise take exception at his conduct, to comply with the observance of some things, which as yet they did not think abrogated. So that in the apostles at Jerusalem there was no design of deluding the people into a false belief, by St Paul's conforming himself to some ritual observances, because their present persuasion was, that it was a duty incumbent upon him so to do. St Paul indeed knew very well, that our Saviour, by his death,⁷ 'had abolished the law of commandments contained in ordinances;' but since these were observances belonging to the temple, which was yet standing, and God had not, by any express declaration made to the Jews, prohibited the continuance of them, he might lawfully submit to this compliance with them, in order to prevent the scandal of the believing Jews, which might otherwise alienate them from the Christianity they had embraced, and to promote, by his future preaching among them, the conversion and salvation of the unbelieving.

⁸ Behold I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves; be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves,' is a lesson which our Saviour gave his disciples, and which St Paul, more especially at this time, when he was every where surrounded by his enemies, had occasion to put in practice. Most casuists are of opinion, that, by all innocent means, it is allowable to sow divisions among the wicked; because the union of the wicked is as prejudicial to the cause of religion, as the disunion of the good is destructive to it. If therefore St Paul, by an innocent address, could set the Pharisees and Sadducees at variance, there is no reason to be given why he should decline it. Had he indeed, in so doing, but implicitly denied himself to be a Christian, this had been an inexcusable crime; but both the Pharisees and Sadducees were too well acquainted with him, and his conversion, ever to put that construction upon his words. The resurrection of the dead was a principal doctrine of the Christian religion; and as it was coincident with the faith of the Pharisees, I cannot see how he could use a more proper argument to convince them of their fault and folly in persecuting Christians, than to show, that they themselves did hold one of the prime articles of the Christian faith; and if by declaring this doctrine of Christianity before them, he engaged the Pharisees on his side, and thereby declined the malice and rage of his enemies, who can say, but that, in this putting the wisdom of the serpent in execution, he still preserved the harmlessness of the dove?

¹ Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part 2. p. 93.² Hammond's Annotations on Philip ii. 3. ³ Ibid. on Acts xvi.⁴ Calmet's Commentary on Acts xvi. ⁵ Acts xxi. 20, &c.⁶ Gal. iii. 10.⁷ Ephes. ii. 15.⁸ Mat. x. 16.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98. Sc. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

But this can hardly be said of St Peter's prevarication at Antioch. ¹ He, at his first coming down to that place, made use of the liberty which the gospel had given him: he familiarly eat, and conversed with the Gentile converts, accounting them, now that the partition-wall was broken down, no longer ² strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. This he had been taught by the vision of the sheet let down from heaven; this had been lately decreed, and he himself had promoted, and subscribed it in the synod at Jerusalem; this he had before practised towards Cornelius and his family, and justified the action to the satisfaction of his accusers; and this he had freely and innocently done at Antioch, till some of the Jewish brethren coming thither for fear of offending and displeasing them, he withdrew his converse from the Gentiles, as if it had been unlawful for him to hold communion with uncircumcised persons. In this affair, as he himself acted against the light of his own mind and judgment, condemning what he had approved, and destroying what before he had built up; so hereby he confirmed the Jewish zealots in their inveterate error, cast infinite scruples into the minds of the Gentiles, revived the old feuds and prejudices between them, destroyed that union and harmony which before his coming prevailed in the church at Antioch, and, in short, brought matters to that issue, that the whole number of Jewish converts following his example, separated themselves from the company of Gentile Christians, inasmuch that St Paul was forced to interpose his authority with rebukes.

³ 'Mark them who cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them,' is the instruction which he gave the Romans; and had he put it in practice upon this occasion, there had been then some grounds to complain of his ^a rudeness

¹ Cave's Life of St Peter. ² Eph. ii. 19. ³ Rom. xvi. 17.

^a Porphyry, that subtle enemy of the Christian religion, makes use of this reproach which St Paul gave St Peter, as an argument against them both, charging the one with error and falsehood, and the other with rudeness and incivility: and says, that the whole was but a compact of forgery and deceit, while the princes of the church did thus fall out among themselves; and so sensible were some of this, in the primitive ages of Christianity, that rather than such a disgrace, as they accounted it, should be reflected upon St Peter, they pretended, that besides the apostle, there was one of the same name, one of the seventy disciples, and that it was he whom St Paul withstood, and reproved at Antioch, as guilty of this prevarication. But this is a crude and useless evasion.—Cave's Life of St Peter.

and incivility to St Peter; but in opposing his conduct where it was blameable, and in telling him of his faults when they were notorious, he acted, even in the eye of the Mosaic law, the part of a kind brother; for, ⁴ 'Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him;' where if not to rebuke a brother, is to hate him, to rebuke him, by consequence, is to love him; and therefore the royal psalmist makes it the matter of his prayer, ⁵ 'Let the righteous smite me friendly, and reprove me, but let not their precious balm break my head.'

But though St Paul might think it his duty, and no unkindness to St Peter, to oppose him in his dissimulation; yet we find him no where disagreeing with St James in any point of Christian doctrine. To silence the clamours of those indeed, who pleaded for the necessity of circumcision, and other Jewish ordinances under the Christian dispensation, and were for imposing them upon the Gentile converts, as things essential to salvation; in several parts of his epistles, but more particularly of those to the Romans and Galatians, he argues, that our acceptance with God here, and admission to happiness hereafter, which he calls by the term of justification, depends upon our sincere belief of the gospel, and our living answerably to such a belief, which are comprehended in the word faith, and not upon any observance of the Jewish rites and ceremonies, which he calls 'the deeds of the law.' This doctrine of justification by faith came, in a short time, to be perverted to very bad purposes; and ⁶ some there were, who from the authority of St Paul, endeavoured to persuade themselves and others, that so long as they did but believe the gospel in the naked notion and speculation of it, it was enough to recommend them to the favour of God, and serve all the purposes of justification and salvation, however they shaped and steered their lives. To countermine the designs of these men, and to beat down this strong hold of libertinism, St James, who wrote his epistle subsequent to these of St Paul, and as a kind of comment upon them, endeavours to show the insufficiency of a naked faith, and empty profession of religion; that it is not enough to recommend us to the divine acceptance, and to justify us in the sight of heaven, barely to believe the gospel, unless we obey and practise it; and that such a belief, destitute of this evangelical obedience, is ⁷ like the body without the spirit, dead, and inavailable to our salvation: and therefore he concludes, that by the practice of the several virtues of the Christian religion, which he terms works, a man is justified, and not by a mere notional belief of the things recorded in the gospel, which he calls faith only.

⁸ Considering then the difference of the adversaries which these two apostles had to contend with; that St Paul was engaged with false brethren, Jewish converts, who were for joining the ceremonial part of the law with the faith of the gospel, and the practice of the Christian religion; and that St James, on the contrary, had to do with libertines and hypocrites, men, who having abused St Paul's doctrine of faith and grace, and wrested it to their own destruction, had thereupon abandoned themselves to all manner of vice, and looked upon good works as things purely indifferent; considering this, I say, we shall find the two apostles arguing very properly with the persons whom they had in view, and though they do not advance assertions absolutely the same, are far from opposing or contradicting one another. 'Legal observances will not save us,' says St Paul; 'nor will a bare belief of the gospel save us,' says St James. 'A lively faith, that is fruitful of good works, will save us,' says St Paul; 'and so will the practice of all moral and Christian virtues,' says St James. Thus admirably do the two apostles agree, and conspire to explain each other.

⁴ Lev. xix. 17. ⁵ Psal. cxli. 5. ⁶ Cave's Life of St Paul.

⁷ James ii. 26. ⁸ Beausobre's Preface to Epistle of St James.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

Nay, to clear the character of St Paul still further, we may observe, that, in those very epistles where he seems to extol faith, and debase the efficacy of works most, he nevertheless makes them the indispensable condition of our salvation. For, having laid it down as a certain truth, that ¹ 'not the hearers of the law are just before God, but that the doers of the law shall be justified,' he plainly asserts, that our misery or happiness in a future state depends upon our good or ill deportment here; for ² 'God will render to every man according to his works; tribulation and anguish upon every soul that doth evil; but glory, honour, and peace, upon every soul that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile.' In another place, having spoken of the happiness of our redemption from original sin, by the merits and mercies of Jesus Christ, he asks these questions, ³ 'What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we, who are dead to sin, live any longer therein?' And in like manner, having made this comfortable declaration, ⁴ 'there is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus;' lest we should mistake his meaning, and think that an empty faith, or bare profession of Christianity, was enough to intitle us to this blessedness, he adds, 'who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit;' and elsewhere gives us this caution, ⁵ 'Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; for he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

There seems, at first view indeed, to be some contrariety between the decree of the council at Jerusalem, and the latitude which St Paul allows in relation to meats offered to idols: but to pass a right judgment concerning these offerings, we must know, ⁶—That besides what was eaten of them in the idol's temple, which eating was an act of religious worship, and communion with the idol, as our eating the bread of the sacrament was a communion with Christ; besides this, I say, there was a certain portion of those sacrifices which fell to the priests, and which they, having no use for, sold to others, who afterwards exposed it to sale, promiscuously among other meat, upon the shambles, where it was bought up, and spent in private families, without any distinction whether it had or had not been offered to idols. Now, as for the former way of eating meats thus offered, namely, in the idol's temple, this the apostle utterly disallows, as absolutely unlawful; but the other only under some circumstances. For he allows, that it might be lawfully bought among other meat in the market; and being so bought, might be eaten in any private house, without the least sin; only with this caution, that whereas there were some who well understood that meat could have no defiling quality imprinted upon it by its consecration to an idol; and others on the contrary, having not so much knowledge, supposed, that its consecration to an idol left upon it such a polluting quality, and near relation to the idol, as defiled the eater; the former sor might freely and innocently eat such meat in private families, provided it was not before those of the latter sort, who, through weakness, having an opinion of the unlawfulness of such meats, might nevertheless be induced to use the same liberty, though their consciences, in the mean time, having quite another judgment in this matter, esteemed eating them little better than idolatry.

Now, the argument by which the apostle abridges the liberty of the former sort of converts, in condescension to those of the latter sort, proceeds upon the strength of this assertion, that the lawfulness of men's actions depends not solely, either upon the lawfulness of their subject-matter, nor yet upon the conscience of the doers of them, considered in itself, but as considered with reference to the consciences of others, to whom, by the law of clarity, they stand bound so to behave themselves, as, by none of their actions, to give them occasion of sin. From which plain state of the case it appears, St Paul is so far from giving the least encouragement to the eating of meats offered unto idols, that, in the first place, he uses the most cogent arguments, namely, the regard we ought to have for our neighbour's soul, and the danger of offending Christ, by wounding and destroying those members of his mystical body, for which he died, to engage us to a total abstinence; and then proposes his own generous resolution to enforce his advice: ⁷ 'Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh whilst the world stands, least I make my brother to offend.'^a ⁷ 1 Cor. viii. 13.

^a The question respecting the use of meats which had been sacrificed to idols, was one of no small worldly moment to Christians living as a small isolated sect in the midst of a numerous heathen population. The flesh of animals which had been so sacrificed was, as we infer from various passages in the classical writers, after the consumption of certain parts upon the altar in honour of those imaginary deities, either immediately consumed by the assembled votaries in a species of public feast, or, if not so disposed of, was subsequently sold in the open shambles for the emolument of the ministers of religion. The converts to Christianity were thus exposed to a double loss and inconvenience, by their adoption of a new creed: being excluded, by their conscientious scruples, not only from partaking in those festive banquets celebrated within the precincts of the temple, which, from their frequent occurrence, formed no inconsiderable feature in the social habits of that period; but also from the purchase of many of the usual articles of human food, when offered for sale in the common market. The interested sophistry of the Corinthian converts had however, as it appears, invented a convenient argument, calculated to reconcile their personal indulgence with their newly acquired scruples, and to justify their conformity with their pagan neighbours in both these particulars. The argument is a curious specimen of the strange subtleties which worldly men will have recourse to when the observance of the duties of religion involves the relinquishment of some temporal advantage. To participate in the feast upon a sacrifice offered to any 'evil being,' or to purchase for domestic purposes the meat so sacrificed, knowing it to be such, was, they readily admitted, to become partakers in an act of unhallowed worship. But the false deities of the pagans they asserted were not evil beings, inasmuch as they were in fact 'no beings at all;' mere

¹ Rom. ii. 13. ² Ibid. ver. 6, &c. ³ Ibid. vi. 1.

⁴ Ibid. viii. 1. ⁵ Gal. vi. 7. ⁶ South's Sermons, vol. iii.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR. A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

¹ 'Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven;' as in another place,² 'Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained,' are words which are generally supposed to contain the commission which our blessed Lord gave his apostles, to exercise a judicial power over the members of his church, by censuring offenders, and upon their repentance afterwards, remitting the censures which were passed on them. To this purpose we find St Paul telling the Corinthians, that³ 'though he should boast of the authority which the Lord hath given him, for edification, and not for destruction, he should not be ashamed;' and putting that authority in practice against the person who had committed incest among them; ⁴ 'In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, deliver such an one unto Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord.'

⁵ Now, in order to know the meaning of this delivering unto Satan, we must observe, that the church, or kingdom of Christ, was erected in opposition to Satan's kingdom; and therefore every Christian, at his baptism, covenants to renounce the devil and all his works, and is thereupon admitted into the church of Christ, and non-entities; and as such could not possibly be the object of actual worship, nor entail any real pollution upon the sacrifices offered to them through the ignorance of their votaries. Under the protection of this salvo, they appear to have accommodated themselves to the practices of their pagan neighbours, and, as we infer from the indignant remonstrance of St Paul, to have urged this wretched evasion as an ingenious and satisfactory exculpation of their conduct to the apostle himself. His answer is such as might be expected from a manly understanding, united to a humble and religious mind. He breaks at once through their casuistical cobwebs, by a direct appeal to their own practical good sense, and the unsophisticated character of the religion they professed: proving that, even by their own admissions, as implied by their knowledge of the Levitical sacrifices, and their own habitual celebration of the Eucharist, the participation in the subject matter of a sacrifice was bona fide a participation in that peculiar faith and worship to which such sacrifices were annexed. His injunction accordingly on this point is peremptory. 'Where you know the meat which you find served at table, or exposed in the shambles, to have formed part of an idolatrous offering, abstain scrupulously from it.' Yet at the same time, with a beautiful liberality of feeling, which would not strain an inconvenient precept beyond the point actually required by the circumstances of the case, he notwithstanding allows them to eat indiscriminately from the meats set before them, provided they can do so in perfect ignorance of the previous facts, even though they may have purposely abstained from asking questions which might lead to an explanation. Thus far he admits that they may proceed innocently: one step farther would be an act of at least implied idolatry, incompatible with the purity of the Christian profession, and highly dangerous as an example to others. That this apostolical injunction had its effect in deterring professed Christians, at a subsequent period, from such equivocal compliance with pagan usages, may be inferred from that Epistle of Pliny, in which that writer states, that, in consequence of the frequent abominations of Christianity, produced by the increased severity of the government, the victims in the public markets, which were formerly scarcely saleable, have at length once more found abundant purchasers. 'Certainly it is plain enough, that the temples, which were almost deserted, now began to be thronged; and the solemnities of religion, long neglected, to be again observed; every where victims were sold, whereas formerly scarcely a buyer could be found.'—Stutteworth's Paraphrastic Translation of the Epistles.—Note to 1 Cor. viii. 1.—Ed.

¹ Mat. xviii. 18. ² John xx. 23. ³ 2 Cor. x. 8.
⁴ 1 Cor. v. 4, 5. ⁵ Potter's Disc. of Church-Government.

taken under his protection; but when men notoriously break their baptismal covenant, and instead of obeying Christ, openly adhere to the devil, they are then reduced to the state of heathens, who are under the dominion of the prince of this world: and as the Scriptures generally ascribe all sorts of calamities which befall mankind, to the procurement of the devil; so the pains and diseases of the body, which in this first age usually attended the sentence of excommunication, were supposed to proceed from the devil, whose malice the divine wisdom might then employ, as a common serjeant and executioner, to inflict some bodily punishment upon every notorious offender, thereby to deter others from the like provocations, and thereby to bring him to consideration and repentance, and to save his soul at the great day of judgment.

Josephus, in his History of the Jewish Wars,⁶ tells us that the Essenes, one of the strictest sects among them, upon their deprehending any of their society in a notorious wickedness, excluded him from the congregation; and whoever incurred that sentence, generally came to a miserable end; and therefore we need less wonder that God at the first beginning of Christianity,⁷ and when it was wholly destitute of all civil coercive authority, did invest his apostles with a power of inflicting corporeal punishments upon such as either opposed the progress of the gospel, or offended grossly against its rules; since this was an effectual means to keep the wicked in awe, to advance the cause of religion, and to conciliate respect to its ministers; for the proper end of all church censures, according to⁸ Lactantius, is, not for revenge, but to support the honour of Christ's laws, to admonish others to amend, and to warn all not to despise this salutary authority.

St Paul's advice to the governors of the church is far from exciting a spirit of persecution in them: for,⁹ though he arms the temporal magistrate with a sword, not only to be a terror to evil doers, but to cut off and execute notorious offenders; yet to the spiritual magistrate he only gives a pastoral rod and a staff, neither of which are designed to destroy, but only to reform those that go astray. His first prescription is, to try gentle methods; to begin with kind and fatherly admonitions, which from persons in so high a station, may probably have a blessed effect, and restore the offender,¹⁰ with all long-suffering, in the spirit of meekness: but if these prove too weak to awaken a sinner who has fallen into the lethargy of obduration, his next degree of discipline is,¹¹ sharp reproof, and severe threats, and¹² a public exposition of his crime: but, in case he be so far depraved, as to have lost all sense of shame, his last direction is, to eject him out of the church, who, while he continues in it, will be a perpetual scandal to it, and¹³ give the enemies of the Lord an occasion to blaspheme; however, only so to eject him, as that, upon his repentance and reformation, he may be restored again, and not¹⁴ swallowed up, as the apostle tenderly expresses it, 'with overmuch sorrow.'

These are the rules which St Paul has laid down for the governors of the church, with respect to those under ⁶ B. ii. c. 6. ⁷ Cave's Introduction to the Lives of the Apostles.

⁸ On the wrath of God, p. 809. ⁹ Comber's Discourse upon Ordination. ¹⁰ 2 Tim. iv. 2. Gal. vi. 1. ¹¹ Tit. ii. 15.
¹² 1 Tim. v. 20. ¹³ 2 Sam. xii. 14. ¹⁴ 1 Cor. ii. 7.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

their care, who are either unsound in the faith, or retain the faith in unrighteousness. ¹ This is the discipline which the fathers have given us so fair a character of, as to call it, 'the keeper of hope, the anchor of faith, the guide of our heavenly journey, the food and nourishment of good inclinations, and the mistress of all virtue.' Nor is it to be denied, that ² the church's reputation was never so good as in the primitive times, when this discipline was exercised with vigour. Then her professed enemies admired her; great numbers of proselytes daily flocked into her, and could not be restrained by the utmost torments which either human or diabolical malice could inflict; whereas, since this godly discipline has been relaxed, though the church has been protected by the civil power, and furnished with far more splendour than before, fewer converts have been brought over to her, and too many of her own sons and members have lost their first love and zeal for her. But to proceed:

Upon supposition that Alexander the coppersmith was the same person with that Alexander who was concerned in ³ the tumult raised at Ephesus, we may imagine, that he was a Jewish convert residing in that city; that, when he was seized by the common serjeants, and examined before the Jews, as the word προβόλλειν there signifies, in the apology which he would have made to the people, his purpose was, to have averted the danger from him by laying it upon St Paul; and that, from this time, conceiving a hatred against the apostle, and ⁴ having put away a good conscience, he soon began to make shipwreck of his faith, and particularly to call in question the reality of a future resurrection; a doctrine which St Paul, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, had so largely insisted on.

⁵ The philosophers in those days looked upon the body as the prison and sepulchre of the soul, and that her happiness could not commence till after her dissolution from it. Upon which principle they argued, that it was not only an impossible thing, but an unjust and unworthy thing for God to raise the body, in order to unite it to the soul, since the happiness of the soul consisted in being delivered from it, and its punishment in being confined to it. This notion Alexander, among others, having imbibed, began to put a new construction upon the doctrine of the resurrection, as if it imported only a renovation of our manners, and a resurrection from the death of sin unto a life of righteousness, which in all God's elect, as they were sure to rank themselves in that number, ⁶ was already past.

The resurrection of the dead, in its literal sense, was so fundamental a point, that St Paul puts the whole stress of the Christian religion upon it. ⁷ 'If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is not Christ risen. And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God, that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.' But though the denial of a future resurrection was implicitly a renunciation of the Christian religion, yet we do not find that Alexander had actually apostatized from it; for then the apostle would not have excommunicated him, because we find him claiming no authority but over such as were within the pale of the church: ⁸ 'for what have I to do,' says he, 'to judge them that are without? Those that are without, God judgeth.'

The judgment however which he gave against Alexander so incensed that heretic, that he pursued him as far as Rome, on purpose to oppose his doctrine, and vilify his person, and perhaps to exhibit some accusations against him; which malicious proceeding might give the apostle occasion enough to say, that the Lord would reward him according to his works; for ⁹ so the king's manuscript reads it, in the future tense, ἀποδώσει, and so the current of ancient interpreters do account it, not an imprecation, but a prediction only of what, in the just judgment of God, would befall him: ¹⁰ for pious men, say they, do neither wish for, nor rejoice in, nor desire to hasten, the punishments of the wicked, though they sometimes foretel them.

St Paul, no doubt, when brought ¹¹ before powers and magistrates, had a share in the promise of the assistance and direction of God's blessed Spirit, sufficient to enable him to make proper answers, and to secure him against the transgression of any law; and therefore we may presume, that when he treated the high-priest with some severity of speech, he either did not know, or did not acknowledge him to be a person invested with that authority. ¹² Since the time of his conversion, which was now about five and twenty years, he had been seldom at Jerusalem, and when he came thither, made but a short stay; so that he might very well be unacquainted with the high-priest's person; especially if he had not on at that time the vestments peculiar to his function, and such as distinguished him from ordinary priests. The order of the pontifical succession likewise had been so totally destroyed, and, both by the Jewish kings and Roman governors, the high-priests placed and displaced so frequently, that a stranger, just come to Jerusalem, might not always know who was the present possessor of that dignity.

But even suppose that St Paul had known that Ananias was then in the chair; ¹³ yet, as that pontiff is supposed ⁸ Ibid. v. 12, 13. ⁹ Whitty's and Hammond's Annotations on 2 Tim. iv. 14. ¹⁰ Luke xii. 11, 12.

¹¹ Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, b. l. p. 80.

¹² Grotius, Whitty, and Beausobre's Annot. on Acts xxiii. 5.

a Instead of ἀποδώσει, 'may the Lord reward,' ἀποδώσει, 'will reward,' is the reading of the Codices Alexandrinus and Ephremi, which are of the best authority, the Codices Claromontanus, San Germanensis, Augustensis, also of those numbered by Griesbach, and of the MS. by Matthæi noted with the letter f.;—of the Coptic, Armenian, and Vulgate versions, and of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Eulogius, as cited by Photius, Johannes Damascenus, Oecumenius, Augustine, and others among the fathers of the Christian church. The reading ἀποδώσει makes the sentence declaratory, 'the Lord will reward him according to his works;' and, as it is supported by such satisfactory evidence, Griesbach has inserted it in his inner margin, as being nearly equal, if not preferable, to the common reading. An additional proof that this is the preferable lection is furnished by the fact, that it is in unison with the spirit and temper of the intrepid apostle, St Paul: who, in the sixteenth verse, when speaking of his being deserted by every one, when, during his second imprisonment at Rome, he was first summoned to vindicate himself before the sanguinary emperor Nero, says, 'Let it not be placed to their charge,' that is, let them not have to reckon for it with the Supreme Judge, at the great day.—Horne's Introduction.—Ed.

¹ Comber on Ordination. ² Archbishop Potter's Discourse on Church Government. ³ Acts xix. 33. ⁴ 1 Tim. i. 19.

⁵ Whitty's Annotations on 1 Cor. xv.

⁶ 2 Tim. ii. 18.

⁷ 1 Cor. xv. 12, &c.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

to have obtained his office by bribery, the apostle, who had been taught by his master Gamaliel, that whoever did so, was neither a judge, nor deserved to be honoured as such, might demur to his title, and say, 'I know very well, that a ruler of the people is not to be reviled, but that the person you speak of is the high-priest, I know not; that is, I do not own or recognise him to be such, because he obtained that station in the church by very indirect means.' Or suppose the apostle to speak ironically, 'I did not know, that is, I did not apprehend, that a person so far enraged as to order a prisoner at the bar, when going to make his defence, to be smitten on the mouth, could possibly be the high-priest. This was a thing so little becoming his grave and venerable character, that I verily took him for some common man; and accordingly treated him with such language as the rudeness of his insult deserved: but since you now inform me, that he is in reality the high-priest, I beg pardon, because he is what he will, we are not to speak evil of the ruler of the people.' So that in what view soever we take St Paul, there is nothing incongruous in his not knowing the high-priest's person, nothing abject in the retraction of his words to him.

¹ They that wait at the altar in the Jewish church were partakers of the altar; even so hath the Lord ordained in the Christian church, that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel; but I have used none of these things says St Paul. And so far were the rest of the apostles from making any property of the money collected and laid at their feet, that we find them instituting the office of deacons, whose appointed business it was, to see the regular distribution of it among the poor; which they never would have done, had they preached the gospel for the sake of the advantage they made of these contributions. The truth is, the ministers of God, in those days, had no respect to the secular emoluments of their vocation. They could show ² hands that had ministered to their necessities, and to them that were with them. They made it their glory, and the chief of their ³ reward, that when they preached the gospel, they made the gospel of Christ without charge; and St Paul, in particular, had it in his power to tell the Corinthians, that ⁴ when he was present with them, he was chargeable to no man. Considering then the narrowness of his circumstances, and the bashfulness of his temper, we may be apt to think, that St Paul might be tempted to leave some small matters at Troas, in order to satisfy his host, rather than be ⁵ burdensome to any; but then the misfortune is, that this φελώνης does not always signify a cloak.⁶ The other things which St Paul desires Timothy to bring with him, are books and parchments. The books are generally supposed to be the sacred scriptures of the Old Testament; but as these were constantly read in all Christian as well as Jewish assemblies, there was no occasion for sending so far as Troas for what might have been had any where; and therefore we rather think, that they were some choice books of human literature, in which we find our apostle a great proficient, and that the parchments were his adversaria or common place-books, wherein he wrote down whatever, in the course of his reading, he found worthy his observation.

Now if, ⁷ according to some interpreters, the word φελώνης signifies a 'piece of parchment folded up,' it will be indeed the same thing with the μεμζόρνια which St Paul afterwards mentions; but then, in this sense, it not only makes his directions to Timothy of a piece, as relating to things all of one kind, but makes the adverb μάλιον, which, without this supposition we could not so well account for, highly pertinent in this place: 'The parchments which I left at Troas, with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments;' where the words 'but especially,' seem naturally to refer to something mentioned before.

But suppose that this φελώνης does properly signify a cloak, yet who can tell but that this was the proper penula or cloak which St Paul's father received from the Romans, and transmitted to his son, as a mark and ensign of his being a Roman citizen, and which, now that St Paul was at Rome, he was obliged, upon all occasions, to conciliate the good esteem of the people, to appear in. Nay, suppose that it was a common cloak, or garment made on purpose to defend him from the injuries of the weather; yet now that the winter was approaching, we can see no incongruity in his sending for what he had left behind him in the hot season of the year, to keep him warm in the cold; though we cannot but admire ⁸ the modest poverty of so great an apostle, who, rather than be chargeable to any, orders Timothy to bring him a poor cloak which he could not well want, from so remote a place as Troas.

That which makes it more difficult to resolve what this contest between Michael and the devil, concerning the body of Moses, does properly mean, is, that this piece of history, to which St Jude alludes, is no where recorded in the Old Testament. We read indeed, in the prophet Zechariah, of ⁹ Joshua the high-priest's standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand, which was the place of him that impealed another, to resist him; and that the matter of controversy between them was the re-edifying the temple, and restoring the service of God among the Jews at Jerusalem, which Satan opposed: and hence ¹⁰ some have argued, that as the Christian church is frequently styled 'the body of Christ,' by parity of reason, the Jewish church might be called 'the body of Moses,' and that this is the whole that St Jude means. But that the Jews and their service should be called 'the body of Moses,' or that the words in St Jude are to be referred to those in Zechariah, seems not very probable, because in that prophet there is no mention of Michael, or of the body or death of Moses.

The death of Moses and his burial are thus related in the book of Deuteronomy.¹¹ 'So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died in the land of Moab; and he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day: from whence ¹² others have argued, that as Michael was appointed by God to bury the body of Moses in a place so secret, that the Jews should never find it out, the devil opposed the angel in this office, desiring to have his sepulchre known, that in process of time, it might become a snare to the people who were so very prone to idolatry. This is the most obvious, and considering what work the devil has made in the world with the bodies of the saints and martyrs ever since, may well be esteemed the truest sense of the passage.

⁷ Hammond's Annotations on 2 Tim. iv. 13.⁸ Grotius in locum. ⁹ Zech. iii. 1. ¹⁰ Hammond on Jude.¹¹ Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6. ¹² Whitty, Beausobre, Pool, &c. in loc.¹ 1 Cor. ix. 13. ² Acts xx. 34. ³ 1 Cor. ix. 18. ⁴ 2 Cor. xi. 9.⁵ Ibid. xii. 11.⁶ Bi-hop Bull's Sermons, vol. ii.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

St Paul's fighting with beasts at Ephesus is a passage likewise which is neither mentioned in the history of the Acts, nor, in¹ the catalogue of his afflictions; and therefore some have imagined, that this fight of his was nothing else but the scuffle he had with Demetrius the silversmith and his companions, savage men, who might better deserve the name of beasts. But² what ruins this opinion is, the date of the epistle wherein this transaction is mentioned, which was written a year before the sedition that Demetrius occasioned at Ephesus; and therefore others have taken the words in their literal sense, and so asserted, that St Paul was really exposed to wild beasts at Ephesus, but delivered from them by a miracle. And for the support of this, they relate a story out of an apocryphal book of St Paul's travels, frequently mentioned by the ancients, namely, that when Jerome, governor of Ephesus, had condemned the apostle to the wild beasts, at his coming upon the theatre, a lion was let loose upon him; which came and lay down at his feet, as did several other wild creatures; that at the same time, there fell so violent a storm of hail, as killed many of the spectators; and that, upon the conviction of two such miracles, the governor himself was converted and baptized.

However this be, the silence of the apostolic history can be no just exception to the literal interpretation, since³ we find our apostle, in his second epistle to the Corinthians, relating certain sufferings, the same in all probability with his fighting with beasts at Ephesus,⁴ wherein he was pressed above measure and strength, despaired of life, and had the sentence of God within him; and yet we meet with nothing of this in the whole compass of the Acts of the Apostles.

The like is to be said of the thorn in the flesh, and the messenger of Satan, to which St Paul, for his greater humiliation was submitted, that we have not the least intimation of them in all the sacred history; this only we may learn from the figurative expression, that, as⁵ the pricking brier, and grieving thorn, do, in the prophetic style, denote a sore calamity; so may the expression here signify some sharp affliction sent upon St Paul, to keep his mind humble in the midst of the many revelations which God vouchsafed him. But then the question is, of what kind this affliction was?

Some are of opinion, that this thorn in the flesh and messenger of Satan, taking them both for one thing, were⁶ the motions of concupiscence and suggestions of lust arising frequently in St Paul. But the apostle himself contradicts this interpretation, in telling us, that he had the gift of continence; and that in so high a degree, that he wished all Christians in this respect like himself. He was, at this time, according to the computation of chronologists, about sixty years old; and therefore it would be a foul slur to so great and holy an apostle, to imagine, that he should burn in so frozen an age, which uses to extinguish, or at least to allay those flames in the most unclean persons. We are told, moreover, that⁷ 'God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man; and therefore, since St Paul acquaints us, that this thorn in the flesh, be it what it will, was⁸ given him by God, and that it was one of⁹ those infirmities wherein he took pleasure, and chose to glory; as it would have been the greatest impiety for him to have gloried in his impure motions and desires, so we cannot see how the apostle, by confessing such impure motions, could have defended his reputation against the attacks of his adversaries, which it is his chief design, in the latter part of this epistle, more especially to do.

Others therefore observing, that this infirmity in the flesh happened to St Paul after the visions and revelations whereof he speaks; that it was such an infirmity as obstructed the efficacy of his preaching, and made his ministry less grateful and acceptable to others; and that himself complains of such of the Corinthians, and false apostles among them, as represented his¹⁰ bodily presence weak and mean, and his¹¹ speech or utterance contemptible, have supposed, that St Paul had some kind of impediment in his speech, which God, at this time, was pleased to send upon him, and which these false apostles, whom he calls the messengers of Satan, to his great sorrow and disconsolation, made the subject of their scorn and ridicule.

But, after all, the most general, and indeed the most obvious interpretation is, that it was some bodily disease, very grievous and painful to him, which he aptly calls a thorn, for its sharpness and pungency, and a thorn in the flesh, for the seat of it, which was his body; and this, according to scripture phraseology, the apostle calls likewise a messenger of Satan, because all distempers are in scripture supposed to be the punishments of God, which, as it is represented in Job's case, he permits Satan, as the common executioner on these occasions, to inflict.

It may seem a little too nice, perhaps, to define the particular kind of this disorder; whether it was the gout, the stone, a violent head-ache, or the falling-sickness, as several of the ancients have variously conjectured; but this we know, from his own information, that his distemper was visible and manifest to all that conversed with him, such as had an influence over his speech, and was a great disadvantage to him in preaching the gospel; and therefore he tells the Galatians,¹² 'ye know, how, through infirmity of the flesh, I preached the gospel to you at first; and my temptation, which was in the flesh, ye despised not, nor rejected; for¹³ I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling,' as he tells the Corinthians.¹⁴ From all which it seems to be very plain that St Paul had some notorious visible infirmity in his body, such as might have exposed him to contempt with those who looked no farther than the outward appearance, and such as God designed for a means to keep him humble.

There is but one obscurity more remarked in the writings of St Paul, namely, concerning 'the man of sin, the son of perdition;' and that is a great obscurity indeed. The whole passage runs¹⁵ thus, 'now I beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, nor be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means ; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition ; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped ; so that he is as God, sitting in the temple of God, and showing himself that he is God.' For the better understanding of which words, we must remember, that St Paul, in his former epistle to the Thessalonians, speaking of the resurrection of the dead, had expressed himself in this manner :—¹ ' This we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them who are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we who are alive, and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air ; and so shall we ever be with him. But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you ; for yourselves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night.' From these words, some false teachers and pretended prophets among them took occasion to infer, that the day of judgment was at hand ; that it would certainly come while the apostles were yet alive, and before that generation was passed ; which was a doctrine of such dangerous consequence to the peace and tranquillity of men's minds, that the apostle, in this part of his second epistle, sets himself solemnly to refute it. ' I beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him : where we may observe, that this is the same coming which he had described in his former epistle, by Christ's descending from heaven with a shout, &c., and the same gathering together which he had specified by our being caught up together, with saints newly raised, in the clouds ; and that, consequently, all the pains which some writers have taken to show, that this ' man of sin ' is to be interpreted of Simon Magus and the Gnostics, Mahomet and his followers, or the Pope and his clergy, &c., are to be looked upon as indications of their prejudices, rather than any discoveries of the truth.

¹ 2 Cor. xi. 23, &c. ² Calmet's Com. on 1 Cor. xv. 32.³ Whitty's Annotations on 2 Cor. i. 10. ⁴ 2 Cor. i. 8, 9.⁵ Ezek. xxviii. 24. ⁶ Calmet's Com. on 2 Cor. xii. 7.⁷ James i. 13. ⁸ 2 Cor. xii. 7. ⁹ Ibid. ver. 9, 10.¹⁰ 2 Cor. x. 10. ¹¹ Whitty's Annotations on 2 Cor. xii. 7.¹² Gal. iv. 13, 14. ¹³ 1 Cor. ii. 3.¹⁴ Bishop Bull's Sermons, vol. 1. ¹⁵ 2 Thess. ii. &c.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98 ; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS i. 10. TO THE END.

Before the coming of Antichrist, we are told that there must be a great falling away ; which, though some interpret it of national revolts from the Roman empire, is more properly to be understood of a general defection from the Christian faith ; but as this defection has not yet prevailed, we may adventure to say, that this son of perdition is not yet come. The true spirit of Christianity indeed, in a great measure, is departed from us ; but we are not come yet to make an open renunciation of our Christian profession, which is the apostasy here spoken of. Mahomet was a great oppressor of the Christians, and his successors compelled vast numbers to aljure the name of Jesus ; but neither is he the man of sin here intended, since it is now above eleven hundred years from the time of his first appearing in the world, and yet ² all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation, notwithstanding the scripture antichrist was to precede, and not at so vast a distance to be sure, the coming of our Lord to judgment.

Without concerning ourselves, then, with the many ^a fabulous accounts which some of the ancients have given us of the origin of antichrist, the nature of his kingdom, or the manner of his extinction ; we may in some measure gather from scripture,—That toward the conclusion of the world, some mighty prince or other will arise, a man monstrous for his wickedness and impiety, who, by the power of his arms, will conquer a great part of the world, and, by the violence of his persecutions, cause great defections from the Christian faith ; that having subdued many kings, and established his religion, which probably will be paganism, in several countries, in time he will come to forget that he is man, and accordingly have his statues erected in places of divine worship, and the prayers of the people addressed to him, as if he were a god : that our blessed Lord, provoked with his pride and arrogance, will at length bring upon him such a remarkable judgment, as will put a quick period to all his pomp and glory, rescue his servants from his tyranny and infatuation ; and then shall the end of all things come.

Thus we have endeavoured to clear the character of the apostles in general, and more especially of the great apostle of the Gentiles, from the cavils of the impious and profane ; and to answer the principal objections which, in the history of their acts, and in the course of their epistles, are commonly advanced by those who delight ³ ' in vain babblings, and opposition of science, falsely so called ; ' and upon a review of the whole, we may take up the words of St Paul, and say, ⁴ ' If our ² 2 Pet. iii. 4.³ 1 Tim. vi. 20.⁴ 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

^a To this purpose they tell us, that this man of sin, or antichrist, will be born of a Jewish family, and come out of the tribe of Dan ; which, as they imagine, is still subsisting in Babylonia ; that being born in Babylonia, he will there lay the foundations of his empire ; and the Jews, mistaking him for their Messiah, will be the first who will declare for him, acknowledge his dominion, and enjoy the chief employments in his government ; that as soon as he appears, he will begin with attacking the Roman empire, which at that time will be divided among ten powerful kings ; and having subdued Egypt, Ethiopia, and Libya, will then march to Jerusalem, and there fix the seat of his kingdom. That having made himself master of the eastern and western empire, he will turn all his thoughts towards the destruction of Christ's kingdom, and the persecution of good men, by which means great numbers will apostatise from the Christian faith, and pay their adorations to him ; that the righteous, under his persecution, will retire to the mount of Olives, where they will soon be attacked by this enemy of God ; but, upon their earnest application to heaven for help, God will send Jesus Christ to assist them : that Christ will descend from heaven, attended by his angels, and preceded by a flame of fire, which nothing will be able to extinguish. That the angels will give up the army of the wicked into the hands of the righteous, who will make so great a slaughter of them, that their blood shall flow like a torrent in the valley : and, lastly, that antichrist will be put to death in his own tent, and upon his own throne, without receiving the least assistance from any ; for to him they apply these words of Daniel, ' he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas and the glorious holy mountains, yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him, (Dan. xi. 45.) They who would know more particularly what is said of antichrist, may consult Mabenda on Antichrist, and Calmet's Dissertation upon that subject, placed before the epistle to the Galatians.

¹ 1 Thess. iv. 15, &c.

A. M. 4102. A. D. 98; OR, A. M. 5509. A. D. 98, &c. FROM ACTS I. 10. TO THE END.

gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost; in whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them who believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine into them.^a CHAP. III.—Of the Profane History during this period, viz. from the Birth of Christ, to the Completion of the Canon of the New Testament.

SUCH parts of the Jewish history as had any analogy to the things contained in the New Testament, we have already remarked in the notes annexed to this work; and what we have further to do is,^a to recite some such principal passages in the Roman history, (especially in the lives of the several emperors who lived in the apostolic age,) as have any connection with these sacred writings.

In our last dissertation of this kind, we left Augustus Cæsar in the very zenith of his power and glory; after the defeat of every rival, in full possession of the Roman empire, and, upon the death of Lepidus, created Pontifex Maximus, or the high-priest of Rome. But, toward the conclusion of his reign, he met with great afflictions from his own family, and especially by his daughter Julia, who being married to his wife's son Tiberius, by her nocturnal revels and adulteries, had made herself infamous in the whole city. The emperor, though a Pagan, had so great a sense, not only of the scandal, but of the immorality likewise, of her actions, that he was once resolved to have put her to death; but upon second consideration, he banished her to a desolate island, called Pandataria, where he prohibited her the use of all sorts of delicacies, and permitted none, without his approved knowledge of their lives and morals, to^b approach her. Not long after, her daughter of the same name, who was married to L. Paulus, being convicted of the same crimes, was banished into an island in the Adriatic sea, called Tremera. And in the space of a few years, young Agrippa, (his only surviving grandson by his daughter Livia, whom he had lately adopted for his own,) by his extravagant life, and irreclaimable vices, became so scandalous to his family, and so odious to the emperor, that he banished him likewise into the island of Planasia; and afterwards, whenever any mention was made of him, or the two Julias, whom he usually called by no other name, than his 'three biles' or 'imposthumes,' he would often, with a profound sigh, say, 'Would to heaven I had lived without a wife, or died without children!'

This depravation in his own family, it may well be presumed, was one reason for his making such strict laws against all lewdness and adultery, and concerning marriages and divorces. Great numbers of the Equites, more especially, had taken a resolution against marriage; 'not out of any kind of virtue, or abstinence,' as he told them, 'but from a looseness and wantonness, which ought never to be encouraged in any civil government:' and therefore, having highly commended those that were married, and increased the rewards of such as had children, he imposed severe fines upon single persons, in case they did not marry in the space of a year. Yet to show that he would discourage nothing that had the appearance of virtue, he gave considerable rewards to such women as had vowed perpetual virginity. But, that no public promoter of looseness might escape his censure, he soon after this banished his favourite Ovid, the celebrated poet, into Pontus, for his amorous Epistles, and his Art of Love, the softness of which was thought capable of enervating and corrupting a larger empire than that of the Roman.

Augustus, as Pontifex Maximus, had examined into the books of the Sibylline prophecies, as we said before. Those that were genuine he reposit in the capitol, but the spurious he condemned to the flames: and it is generally supposed, that upon his perusal of these prophecies, foretelling the appearance of a greater prince, to whom all the world should pay adoration, he utterly refused the title of Lord, which the people unanimously offered him. And this, by the bye, gave some sanction to the story mentioned by Suidas, namely, That Augustus, sending to the Pythian oracle, to inquire who should succeed him, was answered by the demon, 'that an Hebrew child, Lord of the gods, had commanded him to return to hell, and that no further answer was to be expected.' Whereupon he erected an altar in the capitol, Prinogenito Dei, to the 'First-born of God.'

However this be, it is generally agreed, that in the same year wherein he refused the title of Lord, he appointed Tiberius for his heir, partly through the prevailing solicitations of his wife Livia, and partly from the hopes he had conceived of his virtues outweighing his vices; but at the same time that he did this, he obliged Tiberius to adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, a youth of great virtues and surprising excellencies; which soon raised the envy of Tiberius, and, not long after his accession to the empire, procured the other's ruin.

The last thing which Augustus did, as Pontifex Maximus, was the regulation of the Roman calendar, which with us continues in use to this day; though in some countries, the alteration which Pope Gregory XIII. made in it is observed. At length, being near Capua, where he found himself dangerously ill, he sent for Tiberius, and his most intimate friends and acquaintance, to whom he recommended many wise and useful things; and being minded to leave the world with the triumphs of a Pagan philosopher, he called for a looking-glass, caused his hair to be combed, and his wrinkled cheeks to be smoothed up, and then, as an actor upon the stage, asked his friends whether he had played his part well? And upon their answering, Yes, he cried, Plaudite! and so

^a In this whole narrative we follow the account which Dr Ehard in his Roman and Ecclesiastical histories, has given us.

^b Some time after this, the people of Rome, whether out of love to the emperor, or respect to his family, earnestly petitioned him to recall his daughter Julia. But he answered them, that fire and water should sooner meet, than they two. Nay, his concern and resentment in this matter were so great, that when he understood that Phœbe, one of his daughter's confidants, had hanged herself, he protested openly, 'That he had rather have been Phœbe's father than Julia's.' Yet after five years' strict confinement, the people in a manner compelled him to allow of her removal from the island into the continent, where she lived till after the emperor's death. But her husband Tiberius had not long obtained the empire, before her annual pensions were stopped, and she, deprived of all hopes of assistance, died in extreme want and misery: an end not unsuitable to one who had so vilely debased herself, and so publicly scandalized the noblest family in the world.—Echard's Roman History, in the life of Augustus.

A. M. 4018. A. D. 11; OR, A. M. 5425. A. D. 11.

expired in the embraces of his beloved wife Livia, bidding her 'remember their marriage, and farewell.'

Thus died the great Augustus, in the 75th year of his age, and 41st of his reign, to the inexpressible grief of all his subjects. He was a person of the highest learning and eloquence, and the most amazing wisdom and sagacity; one who had conquered greater difficulties, met with greater success, completed greater designs, and established a greater empire, than any prince in the universe; and therefore we may less wonder, that, according to the Pagan superstition of these times, after his death, we find temples erected to him, divine honours decreed him, and a large sum of money given by his wife Livia to Numerius Atticus, a senator, for having sworn, as Proculus had formerly done of Romulus, that he saw him ascending into heaven.

The Romans, during the administration of Augustus, had all the happiness of a people, and were restrained from nothing but those mischiefs which a corrupted liberty produces; but shortly, after his death, they met with great alterations, and a quite different treatment from his successor Tiberius, whose only wisdom consisted in a mysterious slyness and suspicion, and his policy in continued artifices and dissimulation.

In the beginning of his reign, however, he made a great show of modesty and affability, and performed many laudable actions towards the reformation of men's lives and manners. He regulated the licentiousness of the theatre; banished the astrologers and magicians from Rome; restrained the delicacies of eating-houses and taverns; severely punished the looseness of young people of either sex; and administered justice with great exactness and diligence; but afterwards, giving loose to his depraved temper and inclinations, he became guilty of all kinds of enormities and oppressions, and proved one of the most subtle and designing tyrants in nature; so that historians have observed of him, that he never spake as he thought, nor showed any inclination for what he desired; that he looked sullen on his friends, and cheerful on his enemies; was fair to those he designed to punish, and severe to those he proposed to pardon; for his standing maxim was, that 'a prince's mind should be known to no man;' in short, that he was a most exquisite state-juggler, a most jealous and barbarous governor, a debaser of the Roman empire, a corrupter of all that was good, and introducer of all that was bad and abominable in it.

At his first accession to the empire, he ordered young Agrippa, whom Augustus banished, to be murdered, and then published a report, 'That this was done in obedience to the particular order of the late emperor, who had given charge to the centurion that guarded him, to dispatch him upon the first intelligence of his death;' and having, by the assistance of Piso, and his wife Placina, poisoned Germanicus, whose virtues he dreaded, and whose right to the succession, as well as his esteem with the people, might possibly, as he thought, give him some disturbance, he now began to pull off the mask, and to appear more barefaced in his vicious actions, though not so open in his tyrannical designs.

It was a common thing at this time for governors of provinces to make reports to the emperor of all remarkable events that happened in the places under their jurisdiction; and therefore Pontius Pilate, being now governor of Judea, wrote to Tiberius an account of our blessed Saviour's passion and resurrection, which came to pass in the third year of his government; of the miracles which were performed by him, and by others in his name: of the multitude of his followers, which daily increased: and of the opinion which generally prevailed, that he was a god. Whereupon Tiberius made a report of the whole matter to the senate, and proposed to them, that Christ might be admitted into the number of their gods. But the senate, not liking the motion, and alleging an ancient law, which gave them alone the superintendence in matters of religion, not only refused to canonize him, but, by an edict, commanded, that all Christians should be banished the city; which when the emperor understood, he, by another edict, threatened death to any who dared to accuse the Christians; and, in all his reign, would not permit, at least not promote any persecutions against them; which is so much the more wonderful, considering his natural inclination to cruelty.

For, beginning now to act openly, he treated his subjects as enemies, because the vileness of his conduct had given them sufficient occasion to be so. Many of the principal and noblest persons in Rome he condemned, and confiscated their estates, upon very light and frivolous pretences; nor could any man, however virtuous and cautious, account himself safe; because though he might possibly escape the false reports of spies and informers, yet he had reason, nevertheless, to stand in fear of the very imagination of the emperor. To retain an innocent remembrance of liberty, was interpreted a purpose to re-establish the commonwealth; to testify a concern for the glory of the empire, a secret desire to gain it; to praise Brutus and Cassius was a capital crime; to speak well of Augustus, a dangerous offence; simplicity of discourse was thought an indication of evil design; a discreet silence concealed mischievous intention; joy was the hopes of the prince's death; melancholy an envying his prosperity; and fear, the just apprehensions of a guilty conscience; so that, to speak or to be silent, to be glad or grieved, to be fearful or assured, were all crimes, and very often incurred the most exquisite punishments; for he generally executed his fury with such extreme severity, that he esteemed it a favour, and an act of mercy, to put persons to death in an ordinary way.

Thus miserable were the Romans under the arbitrary government of a most outrageous tyrant, till by his gluttony, drunkenness, and lust, which raged more violently at an age when nature, one would think, should have cured them, finding his strength impaired, he removed from place to place, and at last settled in a promontory of Misenum; where, after several consultations with his favourite Macro, he named Caius Caligula, the only surviving son of Germanicus, together with a young grandson of his called Tiberius, to be his successor; and it is probably conjectured, that he named the former, in hopes that his vices would efface the memory of his own wickedness, and his known cruelty extinguish the whole Roman nobility; for which reason he was frequently heard to say, That in Caligula he had brought up a serpent for the people of Rome, and a Phaeton for all the rest of the world.

During his illness, his spirit sensibly declined; but his dissimulation was as strong as ever in carrying on the humour of his former luxury and debaucheries, and in despising all physic, till his weakness was discovered by Charides, a famous physician, who, under pretence of kissing his hand, felt the defect in his pulse. This the crafty prince immediately perceiving, shortly after dissembled such faintings, as made all the company think him dead, and begin to make their court to the new emperor; but, as he recovered again, to the great surprise, and almost confusion of Caligula and Macro, they soon found means to despatch him, in the 78th year of his age, and the 23d of his reign, either by poison, or smothering him in the bed-clothes, to the no small joy and satisfaction of all the senate and people of Rome.

A. M. 4037. A. D. 33, OR 31; OR A. M. 5444. A. D. 33, OR 31.

Caius, who was surnamed Caligula, from his wearing the military buskin called caliga, in his youth, began his reign with all the clemency and regularity imaginable. He caused the famous models and institutions of Augustus, which had been disused by Tiberius, to be revived. He began to reform many abuses in the state, and severely punished corrupt governors; of whom he banished Pontius Pilate to Vienne in Gaul, where he afterwards killed himself. He took a strict view of the equites, and put all to public shame who were guilty of any infamous crime. He punished with death the spintrix, those abominable inventors of unnatural pollutions, whom his predecessor greatly encouraged. He remitted several impositions invented by Tiberius, and was so popular, that he endeavoured to restore the ancient method of electing magistrates by the suffrages of the people.

But, in a short time all these promising qualities vanished; his care for the public was laid aside; and by giving a full loose to his furious passions, he soon became such a monster in all manner of wickedness as the world never heard of before. He was so proud that he impiously assumed divine honours, and had a temple dedicated to his own divinity; so prodigal that he consumed above fifty millions of our money in a few months' time; so brutish, that he committed incest with all his three sisters, and suffered no lady of distinction to escape his lust; and so tyrannical, that he wished the Roman people had but one neck, that he might despatch them all at one blow. In short, he was so superlatively wicked, as to occasion this reflection of Seneca, namely, 'that nature seemed to have brought him forth on purpose to show what was possible to be produced from the greatest viciousness, supported by the greatest authority.'

His assuming the title of Optimus Maximus, with other epithets of honour, which the Romans gave only to their great god Jupiter; and, because he would be reputed a real Jupiter, his inventions to imitate thunder and lightning; and instituting a set of priests to officiate in his temple, who daily sacrificed peacocks, pheasants and the most rare and delicate fowls that could be procured; and what is more, his becoming a priest himself, and admitting his wife and his horse to be fellow-priests with him; his falling in love with the moon, and as if she had been a fine lady, inviting her to his bed, to taste the pleasures of his embraces; and his deifying his sister Drusilla after her death, and making her a goddess, whom, all his life long, he had made his harlot; his barbarous cruelty, as well as impious love, to those of his own family; his using his grandmother Antonia so inhumanly, that she poisoned herself; murdering his co-heir Tiberius, merely for using a sweet powder; and almost all his own kindred, except his uncle Claudius, whom he preserved only for a laughing-stock; his condemning persons of the best rank and quality to dig in the mines, or to repair the highways; his casting great numbers of old infirm men, and poor decrepid house-keepers, to the wild beasts, to rid the state of such unprofitable members; and his causing all public granaries to be shut up, that such as escaped the wild beasts might perish by famine; his ordering large pillars and towers to be built in the bottom of the sea; mountains to be levelled, plains and vallies to be elevated, a wonderful bridge, of above three miles and a half in length, to be carried from the point of Baie to the opposite shore of Puteoli;^a and, above all, his famous expedition into Batavia or Holland, where he enriched his army with the spoils of the conquered ocean, as he called them, that is, with cockle-shells and mussel-shells, which he ordered them to gather in their helmets, and, after having made a pompous oration to them, wherein he extolled their noble achievements upon this occasion, his causing a lofty town to be erected on the sea-side, in memory of this great victory; these, and a thousand more vile extravagancies and monstrous cruelties, recorded at large in the histories of his life, made him so very odious and contemptible to his subjects, that many began to conspire against him, but all ineffectually, until Cassius Chareas, an officer of his guards, resolved upon it; and, having communicated his design to several senators, equites, and others, waited only for a fit opportunity to put it into execution.

^a To show his power and greatness, and that he was able to walk upon the sea as well as the land, he ordered an infinite number of ships to be secured in all parts, and many others to be new-built, and all to be brought into the bays of Baie and Puteoli in Campania, about ninety miles from Rome. These ships being placed in two rows, in the form of a crescent, were fastened and moored together with anchors, chains, and cables, to make them firm and secure; and over these were laid vast quantities of large planks and boards covered over with so much earth, as made it look like firm ground, or one of the streets of Rome. For, upon this bridge, he built houses and lodgings, for the reception of himself and his followers, and by pipes conveyed fresh water from the land, to serve the occasions of his revels. When this was done, he and all his court, with prodigious throngs of all sorts of people, repaired thither; where, after some solemn sacrifices to the gods, he, proudly adorned with stately robes of gold and pearl, sitting on horseback, with a civic crown, and Alexander's breast-plate, accompanied with the great officers of his army, and all the nobility and gentry of Rome, entered at one end of the bridge, and, with an awful majesty, rode to the other. After this, lodging all night upon the bridge, he caused such infinite numbers of torches, lanterns, and other lights, to be placed on all parts of the works, as give him occasion to boast, 'That he had turned the night into day, as well as the sea into land.' The next day, he rode over the bridge in his triumphant chariot, with Darius, an hostage of Parthia, attending, and followed by a mighty train of other chariots, and all his soldiers in bright armour; which when he had done, he ascended a rostrum, and there made a solemn oration in praise of his own great attempt; and, that he might perform something more memorable before he left the bridge, he ordered great numbers of the multitude to be cast into the sea; and when they laid hold on rudders, or any thing that might save their lives, commanded them to be thrust off, so that they all perished without remedy: after which he returned home in a magnificent manner, for having surmounted, as he thought, the very order and laws of nature.—Echarl's Roman History, in the Life of Caligula.

A. M. 4044. A. D. 40; OR, A. M. 5451. A. D. 40, &c.

Belonging to the palace there was a private gallery, through which the emperor usually passed to some baths, not far distant. Here Chareas, with his associates, met him, and, after some short salutation, gave him a mortal stab, crying out, 'Tyrant, think upon this;' at which instant the rest of the conspirators rushed in, and gave him no less than thirty wounds before they had dispatched him.

Thus died Caius Caligula, in the 29th year of his age, and the fourth of his reign, by his prodigious enormities having justly pulled down the vengeance of heaven upon himself and his family: for (that his whole race might be extinguished) his wife Casonia was, at the same time, stabbed by a centurion; and his only daughter, then an infant in the cradle, had her brains dashed out against a wall: and that if possible both his name and features might be forgot in future ages, his money, by a decree of the senate, was melted down.

Upon the death of Caligula, the city was much divided. The nobility were for restoring the Roman liberty, the commons for electing a new emperor, and the army joined with the commons; but whom to nominate to this dignity, they were at a loss, till some of the soldiers, searching about for plunder in the palace, chanced to spy Caligula's uncle Claudius hid in an hole, for fear of his life, whom they brought into the camp, and instantly proclaimed Emperor. The senate, hearing of this, sent a tribune of the people to advise him to submit to their establishment, and not disturb the public peace with his pretensions; but, at the instigation of Herod Agrippa, King of Judea, who was then at Rome, he refused to comply, and, in a few days, by the clamours of the people, and menaces of the soldiers, the senate was so wrought upon, that, considering him as nearer allied to the empire than any other, being both uncle to Caligula, and brother to Germanicus, they agreed to make him Emperor, and shortly after confirmed that title to him.

Claudius was now in the fiftieth year of his age; but either upon account of his bodily distempers, or the natural stupidity of his mind, he was ever, till this time, judged incapable of any public office in the state. However, by the good acts which he did in the beginning of his reign, it seemed as if he had cured the infirmities of his body, and, in some measure, corrected those of his understanding too. He disannulled the cruel edicts made by Caligula, and commanded all who were unjustly confined, either in prison or banishment, to be set at liberty. In his honours and titles he showed himself modest and temperate, and, upon severe penalties, forbade all persons to sacrifice to him, as they had done to Caligula. To his enemies, and the opposers of his election, he showed himself merciful, and passed a general act of indemnity for past crimes; only, for a public example, and to terrify others from the like attempt, he ordered Chareas, and some other conspirators, who died all with great resolution, to be executed. He took more than ordinary care, that the city of Rome should be continually furnished with all sorts of corn and provisions, by securing the merchants against the pirates at sea; and, that it might want no supply of water, he made a famous conduit or aqueduct, called after his own name, which both for stateliness of workmanship, and the plenty of water it conveyed, at forty miles distant, through great mountains, and over stately arches in vallies, far surpassed any work of that kind in all Italy.

But it was not long before this Emperor began to lessen his care and concern for the public, and to give himself up to his gluttonous disposition, and passive stupidity; so that his freedmen and favourites, together with his libidinous wife Messalina, imposing upon him as they thought fit, became the most intolerable oppressors and tyrants; inflicting innumerable deaths and other cruelties; selling governments and dignities; and issuing out pardons and penalties without his knowledge. The truth is, he was so cowardly and fearful, that, when a rebel, named Camillus, commanded him by letter to resign his empire, he was in a disposition to have done it; so blind and incogitant, that his Empress Messalina married herself to another man, in his lifetime, and almost in his presence; so stupid, that when the news of her execution was brought him, he showed not the least token of joy, sorrow, or any other human passion or affection; and so prodigiously forgetful, that he frequently asked and sent for such persons as he had executed the day before.

After the death of the infamous Messalina, the Emperor married his own niece Agrippina, a woman of a vast spirit and unbounded ambition, who soon prevailed with her husband, even to the prejudice of his own son Britannicus, to adopt her son Domitius, under the name of Claudius Nero, and to confer on her the title of Augusta. Upon her advancement to this dignity, it was not long before she procured the deaths of several ladies of the highest rank, who had been her rivals in marrying the Emperor; and became so very zealous for her son's succeeding in the empire, that, when she was told by some oracle or augur, that her son should be Emperor indeed, but would certainly be the cause of her death, her answer was, let him, so he does but reign.

In a few years, however, the exorbitant power which she assumed, gained her the envy and hatred of the Emperor's favourites, and the disesteem of Claudius himself; who, notwithstanding his strange insensibility, began now to repent of his marriage with her, and the adoption of her son. This Agrippina soon discovered, by his unusual favours to his son Britannicus, and by what accidentally dropt from him when heated with wine, namely, that he had been very unfortunate in his wives, but that none of them had escaped unpunished. Whereupon she determined with herself to procure his death by poison. But what kind of poison to make choice of was the question. A strong poison she thought might make her villany too apparent, and a slow one might give the Emperor opportunity of discovering so much of her practices, as to prevent her son's succession; and therefore she resolved upon such a potion as would distract his senses, and not too soon suddenly end his life. For this she wanted not her assistants, who infused the poison into some mushrooms, a dish which the Emperor loved beyond measure; but, finding that this only made him sick, she sent for her own physician, named Xenophon, who under the pretence of making him vomit, as his custom was to do after his gluttonous debauches, thrust a poisonous feather down his throat, which, in a short time, ended his life, in the 64th year of his age, and the 14th of his reign.

As soon as Claudius was dead, Agrippina, as one overwhelmed with extremity of grief, embraced Britannicus in her arms, calling him 'the dear image of his father's face,' and by many artifices, detained him and his two sisters, Antonia and Octavia, in the chamber, placing a strong guard at every door and passage, till all things were made ready for her son's advancement; and then the palace-gates being suddenly set open, Nero, accompanied with Burrhus, prefect of the Prætorian guards, went out to the cohort then in waiting; who, at the command of Burrhus, received him with loud acclamations, though not without some inquiries after Britannicus, and carried him in a chariot to the rest of the troops: and they, upon his promise of a donative, according to the example of his predecessors, saluted him Emperor; which was shortly confirmed by the senate, and acknowledged by the province.

A. M. 4158. A. D. 54; OR, A. M. 5465. A. D. 54. &c.

Nero, though but seventeen years of age, began his reign with the general joy and satisfaction of the city. For, promising to govern according to the wise rules and institutions of the great Augustus, he, at first, both in words and actions, showed himself just, liberal, and merciful. He conferred favours, and distributed large sums of money among the people and Prætorian soldiers. He moderated the impositions and tributes of the provinces; assigned pensions to decayed senators; used all men with such humanity and courtesy, and in the execution of justice, showed such clemency and pity, that it seemed as if heaven had sent the Romans such a prince as they desired; as indeed, for the first five years of his government, it was so good in all respects, that the famous Emperor Trajan was afterwards wont to say, that, for that space of time, all governments came short of this. But this, in a great measure, is to be imputed to the wise conduct of Burrhus and Seneca, who were the young Emperor's guides and governors, in equal authority, and bearing equal share in their different faculties; Burrhus, in military discipline, and gravity of manners; and Seneca, in precepts of eloquence, and courteous demeanour.

As Nero increased in years, so his vices and extravagancies became more conspicuous. For having poisoned his ^a predecessor's son Britannicus, taken Poppea Sabina from the bed of her husband Otho, first divorced his wife Octavia, and afterwards put her to death, murdered his ^b mother Agrippina, and, as some imagine,

^a The occasion of Nero's doing this is said to be, some furious menaces his mother Agrippina made him, which put him in great fear of a competitor at least, if not the loss of his empire; and therefore, to free himself from all jealousies, he ordered poison for Britannicus: but this proving ineffectual, he had recourse to a stronger; which was cunningly administered to the young prince in a public banquet, and so suddenly spread through his veins, that, at once, his speech and his spirits forsook him. While the spectators were all amazed, Nero, leaning unconcernedly on the table, assured the company 'That it was usual for him to be seized with such epileptic fits, so that they need not doubt his recovery.' Whereupon the rest, for different ends and purposes, dissembled their griefs, and, after some silence, the mirth of the banquet began again. But Britannicus in the mean time died, and was privately buried that same night.—Echard's Roman History, in the Life of Nero.

^b After that Nero was resolved upon his mother's death, he attempted first to poison her; but by reason of the antidotes and preservatives which she took, poison proved ineffectual. Then he endeavoured to drown her; but she having the good luck to escape, even when several of her company perished, he at last caused a report to be spread, that she had conspired to take away his life, and so sent certain tribunes to murder her; and authors generally say, that upon their approaching, and unsheathing their poisoned his governor Burrhus, he thought himself now free from all restraint. He therefore gave the reins to his brutal appetites and abandoned himself to all kinds of extravagancies and vices, such as were never practised by a prince, and scarce conceived by any man. His running about the city by night, disguised in the habit of a slave, with his lewd companions, entering taverns and infamous houses, and their committing what outrages he thought fit; his debasing himself so far, as to become a common singer, musician, and a stage-player, frequently acting a part before the whole city, and procuring great numbers of noblemen and ladies to be present when he acted; his professing the art of a charioteer, taking a journey as far as Peloponnesus, on purpose to run in the Olympic games, and, at his return to Rome, entering the city in triumph, surrounded with musicians and players, brought from all parts of the world: these were excusable follies, in comparison to the monstrous extravagancies which he afterwards fell into, when, having attired himself in the habit of a woman and a bride, he first wedded to one of his abominable companions, named Pythagoras; and after that, became an husband to a boy called Sporus, whom he first emasculated, and then clothing him with all the ornaments of an empress, accompanied him in all the most public places.

Nor was his cruelty less exorbitant than his lust. For, upon the discovery of a conspiracy which Caius Piso, and some other great men, had formed against him, he put vast numbers to death, noble and ignoble, guilty and innocent, among whom, besides Piso, the head of the conspiracy, died Lucan, the famous poet, who hated Nero, for his forbidding him to publish his verses; ^c Seneca the philosopher, and tutor to the tyrant, who, though not convicted of any treason, was commanded to die; and the polite, but ^d impure Petronius, who had been a great assistant to Nero in his extravagant pleasures. Nay, so sanguinary was he in his temper, that, without any manner of provocation, he put many eminent persons to death; as Rubellius Plautus, only for being of the Julian family; and another named Pallas, merely for being rich: a crime for which many suffered in those days; and to complete all his wickedness, having set the city of Rome on fire, which with infinite satisfaction he beheld, and sung all the while the destruction of Troy in derision, he nevertheless, out of hatred to the Christians, accused them of the fact, and swords, she showed them her belly, crying, 'Strike me here, since this part hath deserved it, for having conceived and brought forth such a monster as Nero?' and immediately expired with the wounds she received.—Ibid.

^c He being commanded to die, cheerfully undertook it; but was obliged to seek death several ways; for he had so macerated himself with abstinence, that he could not bleed, and poison would have no operation upon him: but at length, entering a bath, he was stilled with the fumes, discoursing even to the last, according to his usual eloquence, of the most excellent things, which being taken from his mouth, were afterwards published. Such was the death of the great philosopher Seneca, which some have thought a just judgment upon him, for living so contrary to his writings, and for educating his pupil no better.—Echard's Roman History, in the life of Nero.

^d His death was the most remarkable in the world, and most resembling the whole course of his life. In it he proceeded with all imaginable unconcern, opening his veins, and closing them, as he thought fit; discoursing with his friends, not of serious matters, or the immortality of the soul, but of light and pleasant things; and all the time attending to soft verses, and delicate love songs.—Ibid.

A. M. 4072. A. D. 68; OR. A. M. 5479. A. D. 68, &c.

thereupon proceeded against them as incendiaries, raised the first general persecution, and put great numbers of them to the most exquisitely cruel and ignominious deaths.

These, and many more bloody and tyrannical proceedings, had, by this time, worn out the patience of the Romans, and made all men press for a revolution. Vindex, commander of the legions in Gaul, was the first who began the revolt. He publicly protested against the government of Nero, and proclaimed Sergius Galba, who at that time was governor of part of Spain, emperor. Galba joining in the enterprise, and taking the empire upon him, procured the revolt, not only of the armies in Spain, but of the legions in Germany, and several other places, who unanimously declared against the present emperor.

These proceedings drove Nero into the utmost rage and despair, and put him upon a design, the blackest and most barbarous that ever man imagined. He resolved to massacre all the governors of provinces, and commanders of armies, under the pretence of conspiracies; to destroy all exiled persons, lest they should join with the revolters; to murder all the Gauls in Rome, as favourers of their countrymen; to poison the whole senate at an entertainment; to burn the city again, and to turn out wild beasts among the people, to prevent their extinguishing the flames. But he found himself unable to effect these designs. All mankind fell from him and forsook him; which made him become as servile as before he was tyrannical. Nay, the senate having met together, pronounced him a mortal enemy to the state, and solemnly condemned him to die more majorum; which was to have his body stripped naked, his head made fast in a pillory, and so to be scourged to death. When Nero understood this, he snatched up two daggers, and after many inglorious sighs and tears, and some whining complaints, 'what a rare artist the world in him would lose,' by the assistance of Epaphroditus, his secretary, he wounded himself so, that he died shortly after, in the thirty-second year of his age, and fourteenth of his reign.

The death of Nero occasioned an universal joy and satisfaction in Rome; and as Galba was esteemed a person of great wisdom and valour, and had been elected by the two armies in Gaul and Spain, the people unanimously agreed, and the senate in a short time consented to create him emperor, though he had no affinity or alliance with the family of the Cæsars, either by blood or adoption.

Galba was seventy-two years old when he first undertook the government, under the name of the 'Lieutenant a There is something so lively in some parts of the speech which Galba made to his army upon this occasion, that it is well worthy our observation.— It grieves me to say, but it hinders not every man from seeing, that no slave, under the severest master, ever endured a year of harder service, than we have so many under Nero. What kind of exaction has he not used, to supply with extortion what he hath spent with shame? What kind of cruelty has he not practised? How has he wallowed in the blood of his father, his brother, his mother, his wife, his master, and all who are valiant and virtuous in the senate, city, or provinces, without any distinction of age or sex! All which cry for vengeance upon such a prince; a prince! no, an incendiary, a singer, a fiddler, a player, a carter, a crier; no prince, say, no man, having a man to his husband, and a man to his wife, but a monster of mankind.—Ibid.

of the senate and people of Rome.' But when he received advice that Nero was dead, and the people had sworn allegiance to him, he laid aside the name of Lieutenant, and assuming the title of Cæsar, put himself upon his way to Rome. In the mean time, several rumours were spread abroad, both of his avarice and cruelty; of his severely treating the cities of Spain and Gaul which scrupled at first to declare for him; of his oppressing them with excessive tributes, demolishing their fortifications, executing their governors, and even not sparing their wives and children; which made the people to begin to show less satisfaction for his arrival, than they did for his election.

At his first coming to Rome, his severity to those seamen and mariners whom Nero had listed among his legionary soldiers; his discharging the Roman cohorts, which had been established by former emperors; his refusing to pay the donative, that in his absence was promised to the Prætorian bands; and, shortly after, cashiering several of them, upon a bare suspicion of correspondence and confederacy with Nymphidius, captain of the guards; these, and several other arbitrary proceedings, procured him many enemies, especially among the military people. Though his rescinding the odious acts of Nero, recalling those whom he had unjustly banished, and executing several of the wicked instruments of his cruelty, were very grateful actions to the Romans in general, had he not spared some of the most notorious offenders for the sake of money.

The love of money indeed was his governing passion, and had got so absolute a possession of him, that he was often observed to sigh and weep, when he saw his table a little better furnished than ordinary. But that which made this emperor most generally detested, was his suffering himself to be entirely managed by three favourites, who, having their lodgings with him in the palace, and being perpetually in his presence, were commonly styled his 'three pedagogues.' They were persons of as different humours and vices as possible; and accordingly, by the abuse of his authority, made him appear, in the inequality of his conduct, both odious and despicable: so that sometimes he showed himself severe and rigorous, at other times remiss and negligent, condemning some illustrious persons unheard, pardoning others without reason, and permitting every thing either to be purchased by money, or granted for favour, just as he was guided by these men.

During this misconduct at Rome, affairs in the provinces were in a worse condition. For, since the army in Spain had presumed to choose an Emperor without any other authority, many mutinies were raised, and factions sprang up, in most parts of the empire, through envy, discontent, or a desire of alteration; so that the Emperor, perceiving that, besides his unwieldy old age, which made him contemptible, he was less respected by many for want of an heir, was resolved to adopt some person, of such an age and authority, as in his life-time might be able to protect him, and, after his decease, succeed him in the empire. Upon his declaring this his intent, his three favourites were very busy in recommending persons to him; but Otho having gained the chief favourite Vanius, together with the Urban and Prætorian cohorts, assured himself of success. Galba, however, resolving to consider the public good, and disliking

A. M. 4073. A. D. 69 : OR, A. M. 5480. A. D. 69, &c.

Otho's irregular life, as too much resembling that of his master Nero, rejected him, and made choice of a young man, called Piso, in whom was an happy concurrence of all the good qualities that were necessary in a Prince and Emperor.

Otho, finding the hopes of his adoption thus blasted, immediately applied himself to the soldiers, with whom he had a powerful interest, and by his plausible speeches, and large promises, engaged them to proclaim him Emperor, in opposition to Galba's choice; which when Galba understood, he was both disheartened and confounded. Some were of opinion that he ought to have put himself in arms, and appear in public, that his presence might stem the torrent of this dangerous faction; others, that his greatest security would be to fortify himself in the Capitol, and there to attend the result of the disorder. But while he continued thus wavering and irresolute, a false report was brought him, that Otho was slain; whereupon he rode armed out of his palace, with his guards and many followers, into the Forum; and at the same time there entered at the other side, a strong body of horse from the camp, sent by Otho to dispatch him. Upon their nearer approach, for a considerable while they stood amazed, and in a dubious posture, as apprehending the consequence of their fatal commission; so that Galba had time enough to make his escape, but by his irresolution lost his opportunity. For while he was considering with himself whither to return to the palace, or retire to the Capitol, he was suddenly abandoned by the chief of his followers; insomuch that when the soldiers sent by Otho came up to him, he stretched out his neck, and bade them 'strike it off, if it were for the good of the commonwealth, and the Roman people;' which accordingly was done, in the 73d year of his age, after a short reign of seven months; and after him were executed his three favourites, and his adopted son Piso.

On the same day that Galba was murdered in the Forum, the senate, and the people of Rome, all acknowledged Otho for his successor; a person valiant and witty, of an ancient and honourable family, and a great favourite to Nero; but more for the conformity of his humours and vices, and the beauty of his wife Poppæa, than any worthy execution of the many considerable offices wherewith he was intrusted. However, when he came to the government, he ordered all things agreeably to the honour of the empire; which together with his pardoning Marius Celsus, who had been advanced by Galba, and strenuously opposed his succession; his punishing of Tigellinus, who had been Nero's chief instrument in impurity; and his generously restoring the goods and estates of such as had been exiled by that tyrant, gained him the love and affection of the people of Rome.

Vitellius at this time commanded the legions in the Lower Germany. He was a person of great reputation and authority, by reason of the several offices and magistracies which he had held in Rome, and elsewhere, under the three Emperors, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero; with each of whom he had been very intimate; but more for his excessive vices, and some personal abilities, than any virtues or excellencies in him. He was in favour with Claudius, for his gaming at dice; with Caligula, for his dexterity in managing a chariot; and with Nero, for the same skill, and some other such-like qualities; but notwithstanding this, being a man of subtlety and intrigue, he had, by large gifts and specious promises, procured the army to create him Emperor, without attending the will and pleasure of the senate, about thirteen days before Galba's death.

When the news of this came to Rome, it put Otho into a great consternation, and the city into no small concern, as well knowing, that nothing but the sword, and the blood of many thousand Romans, could determine the contest. The fears and cares of the city were farther augmented by the great preparations they saw Otho making, and the known disabilities of the nobility and gentry in martial affairs. The chief of the senate were grown old and impotent, wanting both the power and vigour of soldiers. The nobility were slothful, covered with the rust of a long peace, and unaccustomed to the fatigues of a camp. The Equites were dissolved in ease and luxury, and ignorant in military service, which the more they endeavoured to conceal, the more they betrayed their fears. The wiser sort began to show great concern at the miseries and perturbations of the commonwealth; but the inconsiderate were swelled with vain hopes, and extravagant opinions; and many persons, bankrupts in peace, in these troublesome times began to make the greatest appearance, as being themselves most in safety when the state was in greatest danger.

While things were in this situation at Rome, Otho received advice, that Vitellius's forces were upon their march towards Italy, under the conduct of two commanders Valens and Cæcina; whereupon he departed from Rome with a fair army, consisting of the Roman nobility, the Prætorian cohorts, the legions out of the fleets upon the Italian coast, and such others as he could levy in that time. Upon the approach of the two parties, both armies proceeded with such haste and precipitation, that besides skirmishes, and other encounters, three considerable battles were fought; one at Placentia, another at Crenona, and a third at a place called Castor; in all which Otho and the senate had the advantage, though the word on both sides was, 'Rome and the Empire!'

Valens and Cæcina hitherto acted separately, but, joining now all their forces together, they came to a general battle near Bebriacum, a village between Crenona and Verona, and after a sharp engagement, the Prætorian cohorts giving way, the Vitellians obtained a victory, which at once decided the contest. For Otho, though he had sufficient encouragement to continue the war, being reduced to a sort of desperation, resolved upon an attempt, contrary to his soft and effeminate temper; which was, a 'to die himself, in order to spare the a His speech to his soldiers upon this occasion is very remarkable:—'I esteem this day as far more happy and glorious than that whereon you made me Emperor, since it has manifested such sensible tokens of your love and affection, and incontestible proofs of your duty and loyalty; therefore I beseech you, not to deny me this favour, which is, to suffer me to die justly and honourably, for the safety of so many brave soldiers, and worthy citizens, as you are. There can be no occasion for any legions and forces coming to my assistance, since the enemy is neither Hannibal nor Pyrrhus; therefore to hazard your virtue and valour in dangers wholly needless, is too dear a purchase of life; and the greater hopes you have of success, the more honourable will be my death, as being voluntary. Assure yourselves, I had rather die than reign Emperor, since I can never so far advance the Roman state by wars and bloodshed, as by sacrificing myself for the peace of it; and whereas others have purchased fame and glory by their well governing and supporting the empire, blood of his countrymen. No arguments or entreaties could move or divert him from this resolution, which he carried on and effected, with all imaginable calmness and serenity of mind.

A. M. 4073. A. D. 69; OR. A. M. 5480. A. D. 69. &c.

For the night before he died, having chosen out a sharp dagger, and laid it under his pillow, he took a draught of cold water, and so went to bed, and fell into a profound sleep; but, awaking about break of day, and seeing one of his servants in the chamber, he commanded him to retire, and then taking the dagger, gave himself a mortal stab on the left side, and, with a single groan ended his life, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, and after a very short and troublesome reign of only twelve weeks and six days.

Soon after the death of Otho, Vitellius, being still in Gaul, was, both by the army and senate, acknowledged as emperor. In his journey towards Rome, arriving at Bedriacum, where the last battle was fought, he was extremely delighted with the sight of the putrified bodies, and the limbs of men and horses mangled, and scattered abroad; and when several of his train complained of the noisome smells, he impiously replied, that a dead enemy smelt well, but a dead citizen better. Nor did he give greater satisfaction at his arrival in Rome; for, he entered the city, like a conqueror, mounted upon a noble steed, and adorned with all his military habiliments; encouraged his soldiers to all kinds of insolence and outrage: and abandoned himself to the most extravagant degrees of luxury, gluttony, and cruelty, inasmuch that, in four months' time, he wasted above seven millions of our money; nor would the revenues of the whole empire, had he reigned long, been sufficient to maintain his expences. His using all manner of fraud and hypocrisy to destroy such persons of quality as had formerly been his associates and school-fellows: his going to visit one of them in a fever, and, upon his desiring to drink, mingling poison with the water, and delivering it to him with his own hand; his causing all persons to be put to death that came to demand the payment of his former debts, and one of them to be slain in his very presence, that he might feed his eyes with the spectacle, as he called it; his ordering two sons to be executed with their father, for no other crime, than merely presuming to intercede for his life; and his having several of the meaner sort slaughtered, only for deriding the colours of some charioteers whom he pretended to favour; these, and many more sanguinary acts, mentioned by the historians who have recorded his life, are a sufficient indication, that in his government he designed to follow the example of Nero, to whose manes he publicly sacrificed in a general assembly of the priests in the Campus Martius. All this while he gave himself up to such a strange carelessness and stupidity, that nothing but his horrid cruelties could put him in mind of his exalted state: and fortifying himself with confused mirth and sottishness against all dangers and exigencies, he almost lost the remembrance of things past, and the thoughts of things to come.

I may reasonably expect a name for leaving it, rather than permit my ambition to weaken and destroy it. I therefore desire that you would take this as an undoubted proof of my courage and resolution, that I make no complaints of hard fortune, or ill success: for to blame either gods or men, implies a mean and indirect desire of living.—Eckard's Roman History in the life of Otho.

Having thus, by this abominable life, made himself odious to the city, and by the daily insolences and cruelties of his soldiers, insupportable to the country, the legions in the east, though, in the beginning of his reign, they submitted to his authority, began now to revolt, and fixing their eyes upon Vespasian, as a person most worthy of the highest authority, and most able to put an end to the miseries of his country, resolved to create him emperor against Vitellius. Vespasian at this time was engaged in a war against the Jews, and, with great bravery and renown, had reduced most of their country, except Jerusalem; but when his army proclaimed him emperor, and he absolutely refused that dignity, the soldiers, with their drawn swords, and many menaces against his life, compelled him to take the honour upon him; whereupon all the armies of the east came to his service and obedience, and in a general council it was determined that Titus should continue the war against the Jews, Mutianus enter Italy with the greatest part of the legions, and Vespasian himself go to Alexandria, to make provision from all parts, and thence pass over into Italy, to join Mutianus, as occasion should require it.

In the mean time, Antonius Primus, an excellent soldier, who had been banished by Nero, but restored by Galba, a friend to Vespasian, and privy to his design, immediately marched at the head of the Mælian legions into Italy; and before Mutianus could arrive, having entirely defeated Vitellius's army, was proceeding directly towards Rome. This so startled and confounded Vitellius, that he became perfectly ridiculous and despicable, sometimes proposing terms of accommodation, and offering to lay down his authority, and then reassuming it again, till he occasioned a faction and civil war even in Rome, during which the capitol was besieged, taken, and laid in ashes, and Sabinus, the governor of the city, was slain. After this, Antonius would hearken to no more treaties or accommodations, but continued his march even to the walls of Rome; where a furious battle of almost a day's continuance ensued, until Vitellius's army were driven into the city, and, through the Campus Martius, and all the streets, pursued with a most terrible slaughter.

In the midst of these devastations, the people, who were then celebrating their Saturnalia, rather than not enjoy the pleasures of the festival, converted the common calamity into mirth and jollity: so that through the whole city, there was both a barbarous and a shameful spectacle, and a scandalous mixture of cruelty and lewdness in one place, wounding and slaying; in another, tipping and bathing; here, streams of blood, and heaps of mangled bodies; and, hard by, lewd debauchees, and shameless prostitutes: in short, all the abominable licentiousness of a most dissolute and riotous peace, and all the deplorable miseries of a most dreadful and cruel war.

Thus was this mighty city, the head and empress of the world, taken and ravaged by her own natural subjects; and, as it was fatal to many thousands, so it was no less to Vitellius himself; whom the soldiers dragged out of his palace, and without hearkening to any intreaties, binding his hands behind him, threw an halter about his neck, and, tearing his very clothes from his back, drew him half-naked into the public forum, through the main street, called Via Sacra; all the while as he went along, treating him with the utmost indignities, and most opprobrious language; tying his hair backwards, as it was wont to be done to the most execrable malefactors; pelting him with dung and filth, and holding the point of a sword under his chin, to prevent his concealing his face; till at length they brought him to the common place of execution for the most notorious criminals, and, having there, with many blows and wounds, despatched him, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and after a short reign of eight months, they thence dragged him with an hook, and, having thrown him into the Tiber, made afterwards, not only his brother and only son, but all whom they met with of his party, victims to their fury.

A. M. 4074. A. D. 70; OR, A. M. 5481. A. D. 70, &c.

After these murders and ravages were abated, the Roman senate assembled, and, with an unanimous consent, not only declared Vespasian Emperor, but conferred the title of Cæsar upon his two sons, Titus and Domitian; nominated the former to be consul, with his father, for the year ensuing; and the latter to be prætor, with consular power; rewarded Mutianus, Antonius, and several others, with great revenues and dignities, for contributing to this happy revolution; and despatched couriers to Vespasian at Alexandria, to tender him their homage and obedience, and to desire his speedy return to Rome: but, as the winter was not so commodious for sailing, he deferred his going to a more convenient season.

Vespasian, as we said, before he left Judea, committed the management of the war against the Jews to his son Titus, as well knowing his extraordinary valour and skill for such an undertaking. Himself had reduced most of the country, except Jerusalem; but Jerusalem was the capital city, fortified with three walls on every side, except where it was fenced with deep vallies, having the castle of Antonia, the temple; the palace of Aera, the towers on mount Sion, and several other places, almost impregnable; so that great consultation, and a preparation of many materials, were required to carry on such a siege. But what facilitated its reduction, were the several parties and factions which had possession of different parts of the city, and were not only murdering and massacring one another, but, in their rage and madness, had destroyed the provisions likewise, which might have served the city for many years. Jerusalem was involved in these sad circumstances, when Titus, with a powerful army, and all kinds of warlike engines, approached, and sat down within six or seven furlongs of the city, a little before the feast of the passover, by which means he shut up an infinite number of people come from all parts to that solemnity, which in a short time occasioned a great consumption of their provisions.

Upon the sight of so numerous an army, the several factions unanimously agreed to oppose it; and sallying out, with great resolution and fury, put the Romans to disorder, and obliged them to abandon their camp, and fly to the mountains: but the Jews were at last repulsed, and driven into the city by the extraordinary skill and valour of Titus; who, in this and all other actions during this siege, greatly signalized himself.

When Titus had placed his engines, which was not done without great opposition, he battered the outward wall, and, on the third day of May, making a breach, entered and took possession of the north quarter of the city, as far as the castle of Antonia, and the valley of Kedron; which when he had done, he gave the besieged all possible assurances of pardon and civil treatment, if they would but submit. But they judging his humanity to be the effect of cowardice, refused all terms and conditions. Five days after this, Titus broke through the second wall: and though the besieged made several sallies, and drove him out again; yet on the fourth day he recovered the place, and possessed himself of the new lower city; which when he had done, being still desirous to show them mercy, he sent ^a Josephus to his countrymen, to exhort them to yield. But though he used all the powerful and pathetic persuasions imaginable, he was entertained with nothing but scoffs and reproaches; so that Titus was now resolved to proceed with more severity against a people who had been perfidious to the highest degree, and stubborn beyond all example; and accordingly, whenever they escaped out of the city, as the famine compelled many to make their escape, they were no sooner taken by Titus, than he caused them to be scourged and crucified; and that in such numbers, that room was wanting for crosses, and crosses for persons, though, by the cruelty of this spectacle, he only designed to terrify the city, and hasten its surrender.

On the 12th of May, Titus began four mounts for his battering rams; two near the castle of Antonia, where he was in hopes of taking the temple; and two near the monument of John the high-priest, where he supposed he might break into the upper city with the greatest facility. But in two bold sallies, the besieged ruined and destroyed the mounts and having burnt several battering rams, and other engines, pressed forward, and broke into the very camp of the Romans; though at length they were valiantly

^a How Josephus came to be at Jerusalem, and in the camp of Titus, while he besieged it, himself tells us in his History of the Jewish Wars, namely, that after the reduction of Jotapata, which he gallantly defended, he became a prisoner to Vespasian; but, having foretold his advancement to the empire, which accordingly came to pass, he was not only set at liberty, but received into great confidence, and attended his son at the siege of Jerusalem, where he made a long speech to his countrymen, by all the arguments he could invent, persuading them to surrender; but all in vain; although his discourse drew tears from his own eyes, as himself tells us, (b. vi. c. 9.) the factions were not in the least softened by it. After the destruction of Jerusalem, he went with his conqueror to Rome, where Vespasian showed him great respect, and, as himself tells in his life, lodged him in his own house, made him a free citizen of Rome, assigned him a pension, gave him lands in Judea, and, above all, ordered him a public statue. These favours Titus, when he came to the empire, increased, and in honour of him, had his History of the Wars of the Jews, which was now finished, deposited in the public library. This history is a continued account of the Jewish affairs, from the taking of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes, down to the utter ruin of it by Titus, consisting in all of 242 years; but the most considerable and valuable part of it is that of the six last years, where he describes the last Jewish wars, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the miseries of his countrymen, in the most lively and affecting manner. Besides this, Josephus wrote another history, intitled, 'The Antiquities of the Jews,' which was finished in the thirteenth year of Domitian. One half of this history is taken from the books of the Old Testament; but he has ventured to add several facts that are not to be found in these writings, and to those which he has wholly taken from them, he has given such an artificial turn, as shows, that his intention was to accommodate the most surprising passages in holy scripture to the humour and opinions of the persons to whom he wrote. Besides these two histories, he wrote an account of his own life, two treatises against Apion, and one concerning the martyrdom of the Maccabees, which Erasmus justly styles 'a masterpiece of eloquence.'—Echard's Ecclesiastical History.

A. M. 4074. A. D. 70; OR, A. M. 5482. A. D. 71, &c.

repulsed by Titus; who in a council of war now resolved to surround the whole city with a wall or entrenchment, to hinder the flight of the besieged, and to prevent all relief from coming into the city: thereby verifying our blessed Lord's predictions to a tittle: 'The days shall come upon thee, that thy enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee around, and keep thee in on every side.'

This work, though nearly five miles in compass, was, with incredible celerity, finished in three days. But it made no impression upon the besieged, though the famine began to rage violently, and such a mortality ensued, that, from the 14th of April to the 1st of July, 115,080 carcasses of the poorer sort were carried out to be buried at the public charge, 600,000 were cast out of the gates, and when the number of the dead bodies increased so that they had no place to dispose of them, they gathered them together into the largest houses adjoining, and there shut them up. All this while the famine increased to such a degree, that a bushel of corn was sold for 600 crowns; that wives took the meat out of their husbands' mouths, children from their parents, and mothers from their infants; that old men were driven from their meat, as persons of no use, and young men tortured to confess where their provisions lay; that sinks and holes were continually raked, to find the old dung of oxen for food; that the very soldiers who were the last that would want, began to eat girdles, shoes, sticks, and hay; and that a woman of quality even boiled her own child, with an intent to eat it; an act so detestible, that Titus, after he had insisted upon his frequent offers of peace and pardon to the Jews, declared publicly, that he would bury the abominable crime in the ruins of their country, and not suffer the sun to shine upon that city where mothers ate their own children, and where fathers, no less culpable, reduced them to that extremity by their obstinacy,

With this resolution, he cut down all the groves within a considerable distance of the city, and causing more mounts to be raised, on the 1st of July he began to batter the wall of Antonia, and on the 5th, entered the castle by force, and pursued the flying Jews even to the temple; which when he had done, both he and Josephus again exhorted them to surrender: but all to no purpose; they obstinately refused all accommodation, and made it their boast, that they had rather endure the worst of miseries. Titus hearing this, in order to make an easy ascent to the temple, overturned the foundation of Antonia; and having seized the north and west porticos or cloisters of the outward range of the temple, he set them on fire; as the Jews did other porticos, to hinder the Romans from making their approaches. On the 8th day of August Titus, perceiving that the walls of the inner temple were too strong for the battering rams, and that the foundation of the gates could not be undermined, was obliged to set fire to them; yet still with an intent, if possible, to save the temple itself: but it so fell out, that, on the 10th, a certain soldier, contrary to the command of the general, excited by a kind of divine impulse, cast a flaming firebrand through the golden window into the chambers and buildings on the north side, which immediately set them on fire; and, notwithstanding the utmost endeavours to the contrary, spread throughout the whole fabric, and consumed the most glorious and beautiful structure that the world ever saw; whilst the Roman soldiers, pursuing their victory with all imaginable fury and revenge, cut in pieces all they found about the temple, and set fire to the rest of the buildings.

In all these confusions, those who were the chiefs in this sedition found means to retire to the upper and strongest part of the city, called Sion, situated upon a steep rock, where they threatened to defend themselves to the last, and there tyrannized with more cruelty than ever; till Titus having raised his batteries, and made a breach in the wall, they lost all their courage, and, in great consternation, abandoned the towers, which were their only strength, and in vain sought to escape, by hiding themselves in vaults and privies, from whence both John ^a and Simon, two principal ringleaders of their different factions, were dragged out, and the former condemned to perpetual imprisonment, while the latter was appointed to grace the general's triumph.

The Romans, having now gained the walls, and, with shouts of joy placed their colours upon the towers, broke loose all over the city, and ranged up and down in the streets, killing all that fell in their way, without distinction, till the passages and alleys were choked up with carcasses, and the kennels of the city ran with blood, as if it had been to quench the fire, which was now become one general conflagration.

To this fatal end was the famous city of Jerusalem, after a siege of above five months, reduced, in the second year of Vespasian's reign, and thirty-eight years after our Lord's crucifixion; in which siege there perished no less than 1,100,000, and no fewer than 97,000 were taken captives, besides the 237,490 more, according to Josephus, who fell in the wars which preceded it. At last, when the soldiers had neither rapine nor bloodshed left for their rage and indignation to work upon, Titus ordered them to lay the city and the temple level with the ground, or, in the words of our Saviour's prediction, 'not to leave one stone upon another;' which order was so punctually executed, that except three towers, which, for their strength and beauty, were left as monuments of the city's stateliness to posterity, the whole was laid so flat, that the place looked as if it never had been inhabited.

While these things were transacting at Jerusalem, Vespasian, who entered upon the government in the fiftieth year of his age, having been received at Rome with all imaginable testimonies of joy and triumph, as the only person whose virtues and excellencies could recover the languishing state of the empire, began immediately to act conformably to the hopes which all men had conceived of him, in administering justice, and in reforming the laws and customs of Rome; honourably rewarding those who had served him, and pardoning his adversaries with singular clemency.

^a This John was the son of one Levi, born at Gaschala, and one of the principal men of the place. When Titus came before it, under a pretence of surrendering it, he made his escape, and came, with a party of men, to Jerusalem, where, joining with the Zealots, and being naturally a crafty man, eloquent in his speech, and ambitious beyond measure, he soon began to affect a sovereign power over the rest, and became the commander of one faction; as Simon, the son of Gioras, did of another. For he, gathering together great multitudes of robbers and murderers, who got into the mountainous parts, reduced all Idumea, wasted Judea, encamped himself before Jerusalem, and was at length let in by the citizens to defend them against John, who, at the head of the Zealots, did many cruel and tyrannical actions. So that Simon and his army were in the city, while John and his adherents were in the temple fighting and destroying one another, even while the enemy was at the walls.—Echard's Ecclesiastical History.

A. M. 4083. A. D. 79; OR, A. M. 5490. A. D. 79, &c.

Mean time, the conclusion of the Jewish war occasioned great rejoicings at Rome, where all men's mouths were filled with the praises of Titus, who had shown himself so expert a soldier and commander; and accordingly a triumph was decreed by the senate, both for him and his father, who had so bravely managed the beginning of the war. When Titus returned to Rome, he was received with the universal applauses of the whole city, and within a few days after, both the father and the son entered upon their triumph, which was as solemn and magnificent as Rome ever saw; wherein, among other rich and glorious spoils, vast quantities of gold, taken out of the temple, and the body of the Jewish law, the last, and not the least remarkable of all these spoils, were exhibited to the view of the people. This was the first time that Rome ever saw the father and son triumph together: and, as Vespasian built a new temple to Peace, wherein he deposited most of the Jewish spoils; so Titus had a triumphal arch of great beauty and magnificence erected to his honour, whereon are inscribed all his noble exploits against the Jews, and which, as a lasting monument against that impious and perverse nation, remains almost entire to this very day.

After this happy peace, Vespasian proceeded to the regulation of the several abuses and corruptions, which, in the late reigns, and the civil confusions, had crept into the state. He restrained the luxury and licentiousness of his officers and soldiers, not sparing those who had been assistants to him, and partners with him in his victories. He reformed the two principal orders among the Romans, the senators and the equites, degrading all those he found unworthy of their dignities, and supplying their places with the most deserving persons he could procure, either in Italy or other provinces. He examined into all courts of judicature; and where he found lawsuits multiplied to a prodigious number, or extended to an unreasonable length, he appointed proper persons to determine them, and made many excellent laws, to digest and reduce such matters into a far less compass; and to reform the corruption of usurers, as well as the looseness of youth, he ordained, that no person should recover any money of young heirs, if it was lent to be repaid with interest upon the decease of their fathers.

And as he was severe in punishing vice, so he was no less remarkable for rewarding all kinds of merit, though his more particular bounty was extended to the learned professors of arts and sciences. He settled a constant salary of an hundred thousand sesterces upon the teachers of rhetoric, to be paid yearly out of the exchequer. He entertained Josephus, the famous writer of the Jewish wars and antiquities, with great civility, and honoured him with a statue. Pliny the elder, an eminent natural historian, Quintilian the renowned orator, and many other persons of great learning, flourished in his reign, and were highly esteemed by him; as the greatest masters of all other arts and sciences were invited to Rome, from all parts of the world, by his generous allowances. To all which we may add, that his courtesy and clemency appeared constantly, both in public and private, so that scarce one innocent person was punished through his whole reign; and so contrary was his temper to that of most of his predecessors, that he could not so much as look upon the sufferings of a criminal, without signifying his compassion by his sighs and tears.

But though he was thus mild and merciful, brave and generous, yet he did not preserve himself from the scandal of avarice and rapaciousness; which was grounded upon his selling all the lands in Judea, and appropriating the money to himself; upon his obliging all the Jews in the Roman empire to pay yearly two drachmas to the capitol, as they formerly had done to the temple at Jerusalem; and upon his laying heavy tributes upon several provinces, and particularly a scandalous excise upon urine. But for this, and all his other severe impositions, authors do much excuse him, upon the account of the great necessities of the state, and the emptiness of the exchequer, when he came first to the government; reminding us withal, that his public works and edifices were highly chargeable and expensive; his presents and pensions were numerous and large; his feasts and entertainments frequent and magnificent; and that, though his revenue, by those exactions, was augmented, yet he always employed it to noble purposes, and laid it out with great wisdom and liberality.

By this wise administration of public affairs, he increased the love and respect of the whole senate and people, the nearer he approached to the end of his days; and when he had finished his course, which was in the sixty-ninth year of his age and tenth of his reign, his death was greatly lamented, and his memory gratefully preserved, as being a prince of great wisdom, moderation, and modesty, next to Julius Cæsar in war, and Augustus in peace; and 'in whom,' as Pliny expresses it, 'greatness and majesty had changed nothing, but only to make his power of doing good answerable to his will.'

Upon the death of the great Vespasian, his eldest son Titus, both by the general consent, and his father's last will and testament, succeeded to the empire, though not without some obstructions from his ambitious brother Domitian. Titus had served in many wars with great honour, and discharged many civil offices with no less wisdom during his father's reign, he had given too many occasions of prejudice and aspersion, upon account of his severity and voluptuous life; his extravagant passion for Bernice, King Agrippa's sister; and his promoting his father's impositions and extortions; inasmuch that he was generally looked upon as a second Nero; and scarce any man ever arrived at the empire with a more sullied reputation, and a greater repugnancy of the people. But in a short time these accusations and aversions turned all to his advantage, and his virtues gained him a reputation, under the burden of an empire, which he could not attain under the freedom of a private person. For, from his first accession, such was his skill and address, as well as good fortune, in gaining upon the hearts and affections of all people, that he was generally styled, 'the love and delight of mankind.' His notion was, that 'no man ought to depart sorrowful from the presence of a prince,' and therefore he never sent any away with an unpleasant answer. And so strong a propensity to do good, that being told one night by those about him, that he had done nothing for any person that day, with a sorrowful countenance he replied, 'O my friends, I have lost a day!' A sentence worthy of an emperor, and fit to be retained in the memory of all princes.

A. M. 4089. A. D. 85; OR, A. M. 5496. A. D. 85, &c.

His first step towards gaining the hearts of his subjects, and his happy government of the empire, was his moderating his passions, and bridling his strong inclinations; particularly by withdrawing himself from the beautiful Berenice, and sending her away, notwithstanding their mutual loves; and by dismissing several persons who had formerly been the chief instruments of his pleasures, rightly judging them unbecoming the dignity and majesty of his present office.

After this he proceeded with a better grace and authority in the great affairs of the state, and particularly in regulating and reforming several mischiefs, which had not been perfectly removed in his father's reign. All informers, promoters, and pettifoggers, the bane of society, and the pests of the city, he took care to exterminate, by causing some to be sold as slaves, and others to be transported to uninhabited islands; and to put a farther stop to the corruption and tediousness of law-suits, he prohibited, among other things, that the same case should be tried by several laws, or that the estate of any dead person should be claimed after such a precise number of years.

The same activity in repairing ancient buildings, and erecting new ones, the same freedom of conversation, magnificence of living, generosity to friends, clemency to enemies,^a encouragement to men of learning, and courtesy to all, that his father had shown, Titus was not forgetful to imitate; so that if ever a people may be said to be happy under any prince, the Romans were certainly so under him. And yet in his short reign there happened some misfortunes and calamities, no less astonishing than deplorable; namely, a most dreadful eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which being accompanied with violent earthquakes, ruined many cities, and even threw its ashes into distant countries and to Rome, in such quantities, that the sun was darkened for many days together; in the year following a prodigious fire in Rome, which lasted three days and nights incessantly, consumed the capitol, the pantheon, and several other temples, the library of Augustus, and many more noble buildings; and this followed by a dangerous pestilence, supposed to be occasioned by the ashes of Mount Vesuvius, in which there commonly died ten thousand every day. In all which miseries Titus behaved himself, not only with the care and regard of a prince, but also with the tenderness and compassion of a father.

But Heaven had determined that so good an emperor should not long bless so corrupt an age, and a people so flagitious, as the Romans were then become; for after a lingering illness, he died, in the forty-first year of his age, and the third of his reign, not without suspicion of poison from his brother Domitian; and as soon as his death was known, a general grief and sadness appeared in all the city, which in a short time spread itself over every province, to the utmost bounds of the empire, and made him in all parts lamented, as though the world had been deprived of a perpetual protector.

The great respect which all had for Titus and his father, caused his brother Domitian to succeed him in the empire without any opposition, notwithstanding the ill opinion which many had justly conceived of him. In the beginning of his reign, however, he behaved with great moderation, concealed his vicious inclinations, and did several commendable things, to gain the goodwill and affections of the people. So far was he from showing any tendency to cruelty and bloodshed, that he was determined, by a public edict, to forbid the sacrificing of oxen; and so far from any signs of avarice or parsimony, that he acted very generously upon all occasions, and made it the chief topic of his advice to those that were about him, to avoid rapine and sordidness.

In rebuilding several stately and noble fabrics, which had been destroyed by the fire in his brother's reign; in exhibiting a sea-fight on a vast lake, dug for that purpose, and by great numbers of ships, almost amounting to complete fleets; in celebrating the great games and feasts called Secular, of all others the most magnificent, as happening but once in an hundred years; in representing all those shows and spectacles that had ever been known; in Rome, besides many more, that were newly invented, in the many sumptuous banquets and entertainments that he made, the large donatives which he distributed, and the valuable things which he threw among the common people by way of missilia; in these, and such like things, as he knew would captivate the esteem of the vulgar, he was expensive and ambitious, as any of his predecessors; nor was he defective in some other things, which justly deserve the commendations of all men.

He was diligent for a while in the administration of justice, and would many times sit himself, in an extraordinary manner, in the courts of judicature. He severely punished all such judges and counsellors as were corrupt, and acted for bribes; and with this regard, kept so watchful an eye upon the city-magistrates, and governors of provinces, that there was never known more equity and modesty among the great officers, than in his reign. He suppressed such libels and defamatory writings, as any ways reflected upon persons of quality of either sex; but then he expected that persons of quality should comport according to their character, and for this reason turned a senator out of the house, purely for his immoderate delight in buffoonery and dancing, judging that those things were below the dignity of that venerable order. From such women of distinction as were scandalous in their lives, he took away the privilege of litters, and their capacities of legacies and inheritance; and struck a Roman knight out of the list of the judges, for ^a Of his great clemency we have these remarkable instances. Two of the Patrician degree being convicted of treason, for aspiring to the empire, he inflicted no punishment upon them, but only privately admonished them to desist, mildly telling them, 'That the empire was given by providence; and that it was in vain for them to commit a villainy in hopes of obtaining it.' The same night he entertained them at supper; and the next day, at a spectacle of gladiators, and placed them by himself, and when the combatants' weapons, according to custom, were presented to him, he publicly desired their judgment and approbation.—In the like manner, though his brother Domitian was continually conspiring, and exciting the legions against him; yet so far was he from punishing him for it, that he comported himself towards him as he had always done, giving him the title of Associate and Successor, and with tears privately intreating him, 'not to attempt that by treason and fratricide, which in a short time he would obtain freely, and in course.—Echard's Roman History, in the life of Titus.

A. M. 4189. A. D. 85; OR, A. M. 5496. A. D. 85, &c.

receiving his wife, after she had been repudiated for adultery. The castration of children he utterly prohibited, and moderated the prices of eunuchs; but the whoredoms of the vestal virgins he punished without mercy. Such as were convicted but once, suffered death, as ordinary malefactors; but others were buried alive, according to the ancient custom, and their associate male criminals scourged to death. These, and the like memorable acts of justice have been highly applauded by many, but in most of them he used such pride and elation, and showed himself so excessively vain-glorious, as gave almost evident tokens of his future enormities.

After the many conquests which his great ^a general Agricola obtained for him over the Britons, and the reduction of the Samaritans, Dacians, and the Cati, a people in Germany, for which he vainly assumed the surname of Germanicus, his pride and impiety, as well as cruelty and brutishness, became insufferable. He not only caused his statues in the capitol to be made of pure gold and silver, to which the people in great crowds came to sacrifice continually; but his ambition carried him so far as to assume divine honours; for as he styled himself the son of Pallas, or Minerva, so he decreed, that no man should presume to call him, either in writing or discourse, by any other title than that of our Lord, or our God.

This monstrous arrogance brought him into all kinds of enormities, and was the fatal forerunner of many excessive cruelties, whereby he destroyed great numbers of all sorts, without mercy or consideration. Many illustrious senators, who had some of them been consuls, under pretence of practising against the state, he put to death; some of them in their banishments, and all without the privilege of making their defence. Multitudes of others he ordered to be executed upon very slight and trifling occasions; Ælius Lamia, for his making use of jests, though they were old and innocent; Salveus Coceanus, for celebrating the nativity of Otho the emperor; Sallustius Lucullus, for suffering a new sort of lances to be called Lucullus, after his own name; and Junius Rusticus, for publishing a writing in commendation of Pætus Thrasea, and Helvidius Priscus, two philosophers; upon which occasion he banished all the philosophers and mathematicians out of Rome and Italy, and among these the celebrated stoic Epictetus.

The cruelty of these proceedings, and some personal affronts received from Domitian, made Lucius Antonius, governor of the upper Germany, raise a dangerous rebellion in those parts; and being commander of a numerous army, usurp the title of emperor. The success of ^a This Agricola, having first conquered Galgacus, the great commander of the Britons, went as far as the Orcaes, and subdued them. He was the first who discovered Britain to be an island, and in the fourth year of Domitian, reduced it into an entire and civilized province. Of all which he wrote a plain account to the emperor, without any amplifying terms. But as the emperor was uneasy to see his own glory eclipsed by a private person, his letters were received with a show of great joy, but in reality with no small concern. In a short time after this, Domitian recalled him from Britain, under pretence of giving him the lieutenancy of Syria; but when Agricola perceived with what coldness he was received, to prevent further inconveniences, he retired from court, and for ever after gave himself up to an inactive course of life; though his death, which happened in a few years, was not without suspicion of poison, by Domitian's procurement.—Eckhard's Roman History in the life of Domitian.

this insurrection remained a long while doubtful, and became daily more formidable to Domitian, who had so much lost the love of his people; till at length his general Normandus dexterously surprised Antonius, just when a sudden overflowing of the Rhine had stopped the arrival of his German auxiliaries, and destroyed both him and his army. After this victory and success, Domitian's cruelty increased, showing no kind of mercy to those who had been of the adverse party. Nay, that he might thoroughly revenge himself, and discover all their accomplices, he invented new kinds of tortures; and in this particular, exceeded Nero himself, that whereas Nero was satisfied in commanding executions to be done at a distance, he took pleasure in beholding his cruelties exercised before his eyes, which at length indeed became his only diversion.

It can scarce be thought that a prince, who in some respects surpassed even Nero himself in his vices and cruelties, should in the least come behind him in his hatred of the church of God; and therefore we need less wonder, that in the fourteenth year of his reign we find him raising the second general persecution of the Christians; in which, by his letters and bloody edicts, he caused the death and banishment of infinite numbers, both in Rome and other places; in which, among other eminent Christians, St John, after his miraculous escape out of the cauldron of flaming oil, was banished to the island Patmos, Antipas was put to death at Pergamus, Timothy at Ephesus, and Dionysius the Areopagite, at Athens; in which he not only destroyed the heads of the church, but proceeded to the execution of his own relations, insomuch that he put to death his cousin-german Flavius Clemens in the very year that he was consul, banished the consul's wife, Domitilla, to Pandataria, and a niece of the same name to Pontia, for no other crime but their embracing Christianity.

By these cruel and bloody practices, Domitian became odious to the greatest part of his subjects, and exceeding terrible to the ^b senate and nobility, insomuch that some of the chief of them, merely for the preservation of their own lives, were forced into designs against his. For, when his wife Domitia, in searching into his black table-book, which he kept purposely for cruel and bloody designs, found her own name there, with many of the chief officers of his household; to them she showed the book, thereby to excite them to concert measures for his despatch. A conspiracy was accordingly formed,

^b One evening having made a kind and solemn invitation of the greatest part of the senate to a public entertainment, at the entrance of his palace he ordered them to be solemnly received, and ceremoniously conducted, and locked up in a spacious hall hung round with black, and illuminated by a few melancholy lamps, which were only sufficient to show the horror of the place, and to discover several coffins, upon which were fairly written the names of the senators that were invited. The senators were filled with strange fears and apprehensions at the appearance of this dismal scene, and the prospect of death so solemnly carved out for them; when in the height of their frightful imaginations, after some time waiting, their fears were increased by an entertainment of many naked persons with their bodies all over blackened, who entered the hall, with drawn swords in one hand, and flaming torches in the other. The guests, at this dreadful appearance, expected nothing but immediate death; when suddenly the naked persons, after they had danced some time about them, set open the doors, and told them, that the emperor gave all the company leave to withdraw.—Ibid.

A. M. 4100. A. D. 96; OR, A. M. 5507. A. D. 96.

in which the principals were Parthenius his chamberlain, and Stephanus his steward, who, for several days, wore a dagger wrapt up in wool in his left arm, pretending an accidental hurt in that place. As therefore the Emperor was going to his bath, Parthenius, pretending that there was in his chamber a person who had a matter to impart to him of too great importance to be safely deferred, drew him aside thither, where Stephanus, under pretence of discovering a conspiracy to him, presenting him with a list of several names; which while the Emperor was reading with horror and astonishment, he struck the dagger into his groin; but before he could give him a second wound, the Emperor closed with him, and with great violence threw him to the ground, where, while they were struggling together, Parthenius, Maximus, Clodianus, and other conspirators, who were of his own household, came furiously upon him, and, in the forty-fifth year of his age, and fifteenth of his reign, with several wounds dispatched him.

Upon the death of Domitian, the Roman senate, after some small consultation, made choice of Cocceius Nerva to succeed him. He was born in Crete, and was the first Emperor who was neither of a Roman nor Italian family; but was, at this time, for his many virtues, experience, and age, a person of the greatest reputation and esteem in Rome. At his accession to the empire, he took care to rescind the odious acts and decrees of his predecessor. He recalled the Christians, who, from Rome and other cities, were banished in the late reign, and permitted them a free exercise of their religion. He showed the same kindness and humanity to all others who had been unjustly treated by his predecessor, and restored whatever of their goods could be found about the imperial palaces. He released and discharged all the cities of the empire from the severe taxes and impositions which Vespasian and Domitian had laid upon them. He made a distribution among all the people of Rome, much larger than any of his predecessors had done. He purchased estates to be divided among decayed citizens, and had the sons of the poorer sort brought up at his own charges; and above all, he conferred great favours, and bestowed large gifts, upon his friends and relations, upon men of learning and liberal sciences, whereof he was a great encourager.

Nor was the clemency of this prince any ways inferior to his kindness and liberality. For, at his first accession to the government, he solemnly swore, that no senator of Rome should, by his command, be put to death; which oath he so religiously observed, that when two of that order had conspired against his life, he used no kind of severity against them; but first sending for them, to let them see that he was not ignorant of their traitorous designs, he carried them with him to the public theatre, placed them on each side of him, and presenting each with a sword, told them, before all the people, that they might experience the goodness of the weapons upon his body; for so confident was he of his own innocence, that he often said, that though he should quit the empire and return to a private life, he had done nothing that could cause him to fear any man.

But, notwithstanding all this, he had not sitten long upon the throne, before the soldiers, who, in the late reign had been indulged in all manner of licentiousness, began to be mutinous upon the account of Domitian's murder, resolved to fall upon and destroy all those who had any concern in his assassination; so that the Emperor, finding himself insufficient to withstand their fury, and perceiving that his age and infirmities had impaired his authority over them, was resolved to adopt some worthy person for his successor, who should be able both to support him while he lived, and govern the empire after his decease. Though he had many considerable friends and relations of his own who hoped for this high promotion, yet, like a just and generous prince, he sought only the public good, and wisely made choice of Ulpian Trajanus, an utter stranger to his family, but the greatest and most deserving person of his age.

This determination he accordingly put in execution; and having, with the useful solemnities, adopted him in the capitol, and made him Cæsar in the senate, immediately sent ambassadors to him at Cologne, for at that time he was governor of the Lower Germany, with the ensigns and arms of the empire. This proved so great a curb to the licentiousness and mutinies of the soldiers, that from thenceforward they continued in a perfect quietness and obedience. But Nerva lived not long to enjoy the benefits of this happy choice; for about three months after, falling into a violent passion against a senator name Regulus, he put himself into such disorder, that, by reason of the feebleness of his body, and lowness of his spirits, he fell into a fever, which, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, and the second of his reign, carried him off.

Upon the death of Nerva, Trajan was joyfully received as Emperor at Rome, both by the senate and people. He was a Spaniard by birth, of an illustrious family, born in a town called Italica, not far from the city of Seville; and being now above two and forty years of age, of a strong body, and a vigorous mind, happily tempered between the warmth of youth and the experience of old age, he was in all respects qualified for the greatest attempts, and the noblest enterprises. In the beginning of his reign, he was blessed with the happiness of having the greatest master of his age, that admirable philosopher and biographer, Plutarch, by whose wise instructions, added to his own abilities, he pursued the administration of his government, with that moderation and justice, and that wisdom and magnanimity, as raised both the love and admiration of all men.

At his first entering into the senate, he declared publicly, 'That no good man, by his command, should ever suffer death or disgrace;' which he confirmed by a solemn oath, and inviolably observed it through his whole reign. His first step was, to reform the laws that were defective, and to put in execution those that were good; to take care that equity and justice were strictly and faithfully administered in all cases; to advance the most worthy and virtuous men to the highest posts, and to reclaim such as were otherwise, with gentleness and clemency. But as mutiny in the army was a matter of dangerous consequence, the Prætorian cohorts, and their commanders, who had raised the sedition against Nerva, he sent for, and disbanded; without any further punishment, as some say, though others affirm that he put several of them to death.

The informers, promoters, and pettifoggers, who had done great mischiefs in former reigns, he utterly exterminated; and put down the pantomimes, farce-players, and buffoons, as effeminate diversions, and unbecoming the Roman gravity. But he rebuilt the grand cirque, wherein more manly exercises were performed, much larger and more beautiful than it was before, with an inscription, signifying, 'That it was to make it worthy to receive the people of Rome.' The truth is, his love to the people of Rome, as well as all his other subjects, was visible in his relief of the poor, and education of their children; in his behaving to all men with courtesy and affability, without disguise or dissimulation; in entertaining persons of merit, though of no high degree, with a most open familiarity; bestowing upon such, honours and wealth, though he had but a small acquaintance with them; and in short, in 'treating all his subjects,' as himself expresses the matter, 'with the same usage as he himself would have desired of his prince, had he been a private person.' For these, and many more instances of his goodness, and paternal care to his people, he not only obtained the title of Pater Patriæ, but the senate likewise conferred on him that of Optimus, as the best of all princes, which he esteemed more than all the glories of his victories and conquests, because it related not so much to his courage and conduct, as to his morality and piety.

A. M. 4108. A. D. 104; OR, A. M. 5519. A. D. 108, &c.

His mistaken piety indeed, or zeal for the religion established in the empire, confirmed his prejudices against Christianity, and made him look upon the professors of it with a jealous eye, not only as subverters of the national faith, and enemies to the gods of the Romans, but, as their adversaries were pleased to represent them, establishers likewise of some illegal societies, that were the nurseries of faction and sedition. Under this plausible pretence, the third general persecution of the church, in the third year of this Emperor's reign, commenced; wherein, among an infinite number of others, St Clement, bishop of Rome, being thrown into the sea, with an anchor about his neck; St Simon, bishop of Jerusalem, being first scourged, and then crucified; and St Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, being condemned to be thrown to the wild beasts, obtained the glorious crown of martyrdom. This persecution, for some time, went on, though with different degrees of severity, in several parts of the empire, and was so much the more afflicting to the Christians, because they generally suffered under the notion of malefactors and traitors, and under an Emperor, famed throughout the world for his singular justice and moderation: but it had not continued long before this prince, upon his reception of a letter from Pliny, the proconsul in Bithynia, wherein he represents 'the innocency and simplicity of the Christians; that they were an harmless and inoffensive sort of people, who only worshipped Christ as God, and bound themselves by oath to abstain from all wickedness,' abated the rigour of it, so that the fire, which had hitherto raged with great fury, began now to be extinguished, and only crept up and down in private corners.

In the mean time, the Christian religion, notwithstanding all opposition to the contrary, was spread through the greatest part of Europe, Asia, and Africa, extended from the British islands to the farthest Indies, and was established, not only in cities, and populous places, but in towns and country villages, as Pliny, in the above cited letter, testifies. The metropolitian cities were all under bishops of the greatest eminency and piety. The four great cities of the Roman empire, Rome, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem, usually styled 'apostolical churches,' were governed by apostolical men. Publius was at Athens; Polycarp at Smyrna; Onesimus at Ephesus; and Papias at Hierapolis; with many others of primitive integrity in different places.

Such was the state of the Christian church, in the beginning of the second century, increasing and flourishing after a marvellous manner; and though it wanted all human helps, though it had all the force and policy of the world bent against it, growing by opposition and oppression, and overbearing all the powers of earth and hell. 'Whereunto then shall we liken the kingdom of God,' and its wonderful increase; or 'with what comparison shall we compare it?' There is indeed some resemblance of it in the prodigious fecundity of seeds, which accordingly our blessed Saviour frequently makes use of to illustrate it; but there is nothing parallel to it in the history of all the religions which have obtained among men, from the beginning of the world to this day. And therefore, as this shows that the original of it was from heaven, and that the hand of Omnipotence has all along guided and preserved it; so it gives us a full assurance of hope, that the same divine providence will continue to protect and defend it,² 'until we come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels; to the general assembly, and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven; to God, the judge of all; to Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant; and to the spirits of just men made perfect.' Amen, Amen.

¹ Luke iv. 30.² Heb. xii. 22. &c.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

OF

THE HISTORY OF THE BIBLE.

PERIOD I.

From the Creation to the Deluge, 1656; according to Dr Hales, 2256 years.

Ann. Mem.	Hales.	Ant. Chr.	Hales.
1 or 3	1	4004 or 4001	5411
		The creation of the world and our first parents
4	101	4000	5519
		The birth of Cain, Adam's eldest son
128	201	3876	5210
		Cain kills his brother Abel
130	230	3871	5181
		The birth of Seth, son of Adam and Eve
235	435	3769	4976
		The birth of Enos, son of Seth
325	625	3679	4786
		The birth of Cainan, son of Enos
395	795	3609	4616
		The birth of Mahalaleel son of Cainan
460	960	3544	4451
		The birth of Jared, son of Mahalaleel
622	1122	3382	4289
		The birth of Enoch, son of Jared
687	1287	3317	4124
		The birth of Methuselah, son of Enoch
874	1474	3130	3937
		The birth of Lamech, son of Methuselah
930	930	3074	4481
		The death of Adam, aged 930 years
987	1487	3017	3914
		The translation of Enoch, aged 365 years
1042	1142	2962	4269
		The death of Seth, aged 912 years
1036	1656	2948	3755
		The birth of Noah, son of Lamech
1140	1340	2864	4071
		The death of Enos, aged 905 years
1235	1574	2769	3877
		The death of Cainan, aged 910 years
1290	1690	2714	3721
		The death of Mahalaleel, aged 895 years
1122	1922	2582	3489
		The death of Jared, aged 962 years
1536	2135	2468	3275
		Noah warned by God of the future deluge
1651	2227	2353	3184
		The death of Lamech, aged 777 years
1656	2256	2348	3155
		The death of Methuselah, the longest liver of all men
		The same year Noah, being 600 years old, by God's command enters the ark.

PERIOD II.

From the Deluge to the Calling of Abraham, 426 years and 6 months; according to Dr Hales, 1077 years.

Ann. Mem.	Hales.	Ant. Chr.	Hales.
1657 or 2257		2347 or 2347	3154
		NOAH, with his family and three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, leave the ark
		The Rainbow, the pledge of security from inundation
1658	2258	2346	3153
		The birth of Arphaxad, son of Shem
1663	2263	2341	3148
		Noah plants a vineyard &c.
1693	2293	2311	3018
		The birth of Salah, son of Arphaxad
1723	2523	2281	2888
		The birth of Heber, son of Salah
1757	2657	2247	2754
		The birth of Peleg, son of Heber
1770	2797	2234	2614
		The building of the tower of Babel, the confusion of languages, and dispersion of nations
1771	2857	2233	2554
		The beginning of the Babylonian or Assyrian monarchy,—and of the Egyptian
1787	2787	2217	2624
		The birth of Reu, son of Peleg
1819	2919	2185	2492
		The birth of Sorug, son of Reu
1849	3049	2155	2362
		The birth of Nabor, son of Sorug
1878	3128	2126	2283
		The birth of Terah, son of Nabor
1943	2555	2061	2456
		The death of Nimrod, succeeded by Belus
1948	3198	2056	2213
		The birth of Haran, son of Terah
1969	2969	2035	3442
		The death of Belus, succeeded by Nimus
2006	2606	1998	2805
		The death of Noah, aged 950 years, and the beginning of postdiluvian idolatry
2008	3258	1996	2153
		The birth of Abram, son of Terah
2017	3318	1987	2093
		The death of Nimus, succeeded by his wife Semiramis
2018	3268	1986	2143
		The birth of Sarai, Abram's wife
2059	3318	1945	2093
		The death of Semiramis, succeeded by her son Ninvas
2083	3318	917	2673
		The call of Abram, from Ur to Haran in Mesopotamia where his father died, aged 205 years

PERIOD III.

From the calling of Abraham to the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, in all 430 years.

Ann. Mem.	Hales.	Ant. Chr.	Hales.
2083 or 3333		1921 or 2078
		ABRAHAM's second call, &c.
2084	3334	1920	2077
		Returns from Egypt to Canaan, &c.
2091	3341	1913	2070
		His victory over the five kings, &c.
2094	3344	1910	2067
		Has a son named Ishmael, &c.
2107	3357	1857	2054
		Intercedes for Sodom, &c.—their destruction
2108	3358	1866	2053
		Removes to Mamre. Isaac born
2146	3398	1871	2028
		Offers up Isaac in sacrifice, &c. Sarah dies
2148	3398	1856	2013
		Sends his servant to procure a wife for Isaac
2186	3438	1818	1973
		Abraham dies
2168	3418	1836	1993
		Jacob and Esau born
2245	3495	1759	1916
		Isaac blesses Jacob, who departs to Haran, marries first Leah, and then Rachel, &c.
2276	3526	1728	1885
		Jacob makes Joseph his favourite; his dreams, &c.; he is sold into Egypt
2289	3539	1715	1872
		Joseph interprets Pharaoh's dreams, &c.
2298	3548	1706	1863
		Jacob goes down to Egypt, &c.
2433	3683	1571	1728
		Revolution in Egypt; the sufferings of the Israelites; Moses born, &c.
2473	3723	1531	1683
		Moses flies to Midian; marries Jethro's daughter; the vision of the bush, &c.
2513	3763	1491	1643
		Moses, commissioned by God, goes to Pharaoh; the plagues of Egypt; the deliverance of the Israelites, &c.

PERIOD IV.

From the Israelites' departure out of Egypt to their entrance into the land of Canaan, in all 40 years.

Ann. Mem.	Hales.	Ant. Chr.	Hales.
2513 or 3763		1491 or 1618
		THE Israelites rendezvous at Rameses; cross the Red Sea, &c.
2514	3764	1490	1647
		The law delivered from Sinai, &c.
2515	3765	1489	1646
		The Israelites approach Canaan; the priesthood established, &c.
2553	3803	1451	1608
		The Israelites enter Canaan, and possess it

PERIOD V.

From the Israelites' entering into Canaan to the building of Solomon's temple, in all 447 years; according to Dr Hales, 581 years.

Ann. Mem.	Hales.	Ant. Chr.	Hales.
2553 or 3803		1451 or 1608
		JOSHUA succeeds Moses as the leader of Israel
2561	3829	1443	1582
		The Israelites conquer Canaan, &c.
2569	3849	1405	1561
		The war of the Benjamites
2469	3983	1575	1426
		The judges, Deborah, Ehud, &c.
2519	4045	1485	1366
		Gideon, the Israelitish general
2632	4158	1372	1253
		Jephthah's exploits and vow
2663	4189	1341	1222
		Samson's miraculous acts
2723	4259	1271	1152
		The birth of Samuel
2745	4301	1259	1110
		Saul elected king of Israel
2785	4341	1219	1070
		David succeeds to Saul
2819	4375	1155	1005
		His restoration after Absalom's rebellion. Solomon proclaimed king.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ant. Chr. Hales.
3285 or 4096	Salmaneser dies; and is succeeded by Sennacherib, who invades the kingdom of Judah, and takes several of its cities
3291 4686	Hezekiah's sickness and recovery. He gives money to Sennacherib, who still continues the war against him, but, at length, loses all his army by the stroke of an angel; whereupon the Medes revolt from his dominion, and at his return to Nineveh, he is put to death by two of his sons; and succeeded by a third, named Esarhaddon
3306 4715	Hezekiah dies; and is succeeded by his son Manasseh
3323 4734	Esarhaddon makes himself master of Babylon, and reunites the Assyrian and Babylonish empire
3329 4740	He takes Manasseh prisoner, and carries him in chains to Babylon
3347 4758	Holofernes invades Judea, and is slain by Judith
3361 4770	Manasseh, after his return from Babylon, dies; and is succeeded by his son Ammon
3363 4772	Ammon is murdered by his servants; and succeeded by his son Josiah, in whose reign Zephaniah prophesied
3370 4772	Josiah endeavours to reform several abuses that had been introduced, and restores the true worship of God
3376 4783	At this time Jeremiah begins to prophesy
3384 4803	Josiah is slain in battle against Necho, king of Egypt; (whereupon Jeremiah composes his book of Lamentations) and is succeeded first by Jehoahaz, and after him by Jehoikim, in whose reign Habakkuk prophesied
3398 4825	Nebuchadnezzar takes Jerusalem, and carries Daniel and his companions captives into Babylon
3402 4819	Daniel interprets Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the great statue
3404 4815	The history of Susanna at Babylon, and Jehoikim's revolt against Nebuchadnezzar
3405 4812	The birth of Cyrus, and the death of Jehoikim, whose body is thrown into the highway without any burial; and the succession of Jeconiah, who (after a short reign) is taken, and carried to Babylon, while his uncle Zedekiah is left at Jerusalem in his place
3410 4821	Ezekiel begins to prophesy in Chaldea, and foretels the destruction of Jerusalem
3412 4823	Zedekiah confederates with the king of Egypt, and revolts against Nebuchadnezzar
3414 4825	Nebuchadnezzar besieges Jerusalem; defeats the Egyptian army; takes the city; and utterly destroys it, with the temple; puts out Zedekiah's eyes; carries him to Babylon; and sends the Jews, that were left in the country, captive beyond the Euphrates. And thus ended the kingdom of Judea, after it had subsisted, from the time of the separation, 388 years

PERIOD VII.

From the Babylonish Captivity to the Birth of Christ, in all 588 years; according to Dr Hales, 586 years.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ant. Chr. Hales.
3416 or 4827	GEDALIAH is made governor of the people left in Judea, and is murdered by Ishmael
3468 4875	CYRUS puts an end to the 70 years' captivity, granting the Jews liberty to return to their country
3488 4895	Temple finished
3479 4882	Death of Cyrus, succeeded by Cambyses, Smerdis the Magian, in Scripture called ARTAXERXES, succeeds Cambyses the same year
3483 4890	Darius makes a decree in favour of the Jews
3517 4928	The high priest Jehoikim
3523 4926	Xerxes invades Greece, succeeded by Artaxerxes, called in Scripture Ahasuerus
3541 4947	Ezra is made governor of Judea
3556 4967	Nehemiah governs Judea twelve years
3648 5055	Alexander the Great born at Pella
3667 5070	The temple on Mount Gerizzim begins to be built by Manasseh
3681 5092	Alexander dies, and the Grecian begins
3716 5127	Ptolemy Philadelphus, under whom the Scriptures were translated, begins his reign in Egypt
3844 5247	Death of Antiochus Epiphanes
3902 5305	Death of Hyrcanus, rise of the Jewish sects
3929 5333	Death of Alexander Jannæus
3939 5342	Upon Alexander's death, Aristobulus seizes the kingdom of Judea
3998 5394	Herod kills his two sons
4009 5411	The birth of our blessed Lord and Saviour.

MEDIAN AND PERSIAN DYNASTY.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ant. Chr. Hales.
3447 4858	Darius the Mede or Cyaxares
3449 4860	Cyrus the Persian
3464 4875	Cyrus Babylon the first year of his reign. The same year the Jews return under Zerobabel. The first high priest, Joshua, same year
3465 4876	The second temple begun
3471 4882	Cambyses reigns
3479 4890	Darius Hystaspes
3484 4895	Temple finished
3515 4926	Xerxes
3517 4928	High priest Jehoiakim
3536 4947	Artaxerxes Longimanus
3537 4948	Stops the rebuilding of Jerusalem
3540 4951	Artaxerxes marries Esther
3543 4954	Sends Ezra to Judea
3547 4958	High priest Elshish Nehemiah governor, as before
3577 4988	Darius Nothus
3580 4991	Nehemiah's reform. End of the Old Testament canon

PERIOD VIII.

From the birth of Christ to the completion of the canon of the New Testament; in all about 97 years.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ann. Chr. Hales.
4004 or 5411	The Vulgar Era is four years short of the computation general received, and five behind Dr Hales, as in the column annexed
4033 5437	Our Lord is baptized by John
4034 5438	Our Lord chooses several disciples
4035 5440	Our Lord's first journey to Jerusalem
4036 5441	Our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem
4037 5442	Our Lord's transfiguration
4038 5444	The apostles begin their ministry
4040 5446	Conversion of St Paul
4061 5454	His shipwreck, &c.
4066 5462	Writes several of his epistles, &c.
4669 5473	The Jewish Rebellion
4075 5479	Jerusalem totally destroyed

PERSIAN DYNASTY.

JEWISH HIGH PRIESTS.

From Nehemiah's reform to the birth of John the Baptist, 415 years.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ant. Chr. Hales.
3580 4991	Eliashib
3587 4998	Joiada or Judas
3627 4078	Jonathan or John
3659 5070	Jaddua or Jaddus

MACEDO-GRECIAN DYNASTY.

JEWISH HIGH PRIESTS.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ant. Chr. Hales.
3679 5090	Onias
3700 5111	Simon the Just
3709 5120	Eliazar
3724 5135	Manasses
3750 5161	Onias II.
3783 5194	Simon II.
3805 5216	Onias III.
3825 5236	Jesus or Jason
3828 5237	Onias or Menelaus

ASMONÆAN PRINCES OR MACCABEES.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ant. Chr. Hales.
3837 5241	Judas Maccabeus
3837 5248	High Priest Jachim or Alchimus
3840 4251	Jonathan
3847 5258	Appointed high priest
3857 5268	Simon
3864 5275	John Hyrcanus
3884 5305	Aristobulus and Antigonus
3895 5306	Alexander Jannæus
3929 5333	Queen Alexandra
3931 5342	Hyrcanus II.
3931 5342	Aristobulus II.

ROMAN DYNASTY.

Ann. Mon. Hales.	Ant. Chr. Hales.
3937 5848	Pompey takes Jerusalem
3737 5348	Hyrcanus II. again
3960 5371	Antigonus
3963 5396	Idmæan king, Herod the Great
3965 5406	John Baptist born
	From his birth to the destruction of Jerusalem, seventy-five years.
	Nativity of our Lord about autumn.
	Passover, A. D. 25, &c. Jerusalem destroyed

AN ACCOUNT OF THE YEARS, MONTHS, AND CALENDAR OF THE JEWS;

TOGETHER WITH

A REDUCTION OF THE MONEY, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES

TO THE

PRESENT STANDARD AND MANNER OF COMPUTATION,

TO WHICH THE READER IN THE COURSE OF THE HISTORY WILL HAVE FREQUENT OCCASION TO REFER.

THE JEWISH YEARS.

The Hebrews did originally, even as the Syrians and Phœnicians, begin their year from the autumnal equinox: but, upon their coming up out of the land of Egypt, which happened in the month Nisan, they, in commemoration of that deliverance, made their year commence at the beginning of that month, which usually happened about the time of the vernal equinox.¹ This form they ever after made use of in the calculation of the times of their feasts, festivals, and all other ecclesiastical concerns; but in all civil matters, as contracts, obligations, and all other affairs that were of a secular nature, they still made use of the old form, and began their year as formerly, from the first of Tisri, which happened about the time of the autumnal equinox: so that the Jews had two ways of beginning their year—their sacred year, as they called it, with the month Nisan, and the civil year, with the month Tisri.

The form of the year which they anciently made use of, was wholly inartificial: for it was not settled by any astronomical rules or calculations, but was made of lunar months set out by the phasis or appearance of the moon. When they saw the new moon, they began their months, which sometimes consisted of 29, and sometimes of 30 days, according as the new moon did sooner or later appear. The reason of this was, because the synodical course of the moon, that is, from new moon to new moon, being twenty-nine days and a half, the half day, which a month of twenty-nine days fell short of, was made up, by adding it to the next month, which made it consist of thirty days: so that their months were made up of twenty-nine days, or thirty days, successively and alternately; with this certain rule, that the first or initial month, whether of their sacred or civil year, always consisted of thirty days, and the first day of each month was called the new moon. Of twelve of these months did their common year consist: but as twelve lunar months fell eleven days short of a solar year, so every one of these common years begin eleven days sooner, which, in thirty years' time, would carry back the beginning of the year through all the four seasons, to the same point again, and get a whole year from the solar reckoning. To remedy therefore the confusion that might from hence arise, their custom was, sometimes in the third year, and sometimes in the second, to cast in another month which they called Veader, or the second Adar, and make their years then consist of thirteen months; so that by the help of this intercalation, they reduce their lunar year in some measure to that of the sun, and never suffered the one, for any more than a month at any time, to vary from the other.

This intercalation of a month, however, every second or third year, makes it impracticable to fix the beginnings of the Jewish months to any certain day in the Julian calendar; but they therein always fell within the compass of thirty days, sooner or later. I have given the reader the best view I could of their coincidence and correspondency, in the following scheme, wherein the first column gives the several names and order of the Jewish months, and the second of the Julian, within the compass of which the said Jewish months have always, sooner or later, their beginning and ending.

JEWISH MONTHS.

1 Nisan	{ March and April,	7 Tisri	{ September and October,
2 Jyar	{ April and May,	8 Machesvan	{ October and November,
3 Sivan	{ May and June,	9 Cisleu	{ November and December,
4 Tamuz	{ June and July,	10 Tebeth	{ December and January,
5 Ab	{ July and August,	11 Shebat	{ January and February,
6 Elul	{ August and September,	12 Adar	{ February and March.

¹ Prideaux's Connexion, in the preface.

The thirteenth month (Veader) is then only intercalated, or cast in, when the beginning of Nisan would otherwise be carried back into the end of February.

The Jews of old had very exact calendars, wherein were set down their several fasts and festivals, and all those days wherein they celebrated the memory of any great event that had happened in their nation; but these are no longer extant. All they have that favours of any antiquity, is their Megillah Thaarith or Volume of affliction, which contains the days of fasting and feasting that were heretofore in use among them, but are now laid aside; and therefore no longer to be found in their common calendars. Out of this volume, however, as well as some of their other calendars, I thought it not improper to set down some of their historical events, in order to let the reader see on what particular day of each month their memorial, whether by fasting or feasting, was observed.

THE JEWISH CALENDAR.

1. NISAN OR ABIB.

Days.

- I. New moon. Beginning of the sacred or ecclesiastical year, a fast for the death of the children of Aaron, Lev. x. 1, 2.
 X. A fast for the death of Miriam, the sister of Moses, Numb. xx. 1.
 XIV. The paschal lamb slain on the evening of this day.
 XV. The great and solemn feast of the passover.
 XVI. The oblation of the first fruits of the harvest.
 XXI. The conclusion of the passover, or end of unleavened bread.
 XXIV. A fast for the death of Joshua.

2. JYAR OR JIAR.

- VII. The dedication of the temple, when the Asmoneans consecrated it again after the persecutions of the Greeks.
 X. A fast for the death of the high-priest Eli, and for the taking of the ark by the Philistines.
 XXIII. A fast for the taking of the city of Gaza by Simon Maccabeus, 1 Mac. xiii. 43, 44.
 XXVIII. A fast for the death of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. xxx. 1.

3. SIVAN.

- VI. Pentecost, or the fiftieth day after the passover, called likewise the feast of weeks, because it happened seven weeks after the passover.
 XV. A feast for the victory of the Maccabees over the people of Bethsam, 1 Mac. v. 52.
 XVII. A feast for the taking of Casarea by the Asmoneans.
 XXVII. A fast in remembrance of Jeroboam's forbidding his subjects to carry their first fruits to Jerusalem, 1 Kings xii. 27.
 XXX. A feast in memory of the solemn judgment given by Alexander the Great, in favour of the Jews, against the Ishmaelites and Egyptians.

4. TAMUZ OR THAMMUZ.

- IX. A fast for the taking of Jerusalem on that day, but whether by Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, or the Romans, it is not said.
 XVII. A fast in memory of the tables of the law that were broken by Moses, Exod. xxxii. 15.

5. AB.

- IX. A fast in memory of God's declaring to Moses, as on this day, that none of the murmuring Israelites should enter into the land of Canaan, Numb. xiv. 29, 31.

Days.

- X. A fast, because on this same day the city and temple were taken and burnt, first by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans.
 XVIII. A fast, because that, in the time of Ahab, the evening lamp went out.

6. ELUL.

- VII. A feast in memory of the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah, Ezra vi. 16.
 XVII. A fast for the death of the spies, who brought an ill report of the land of promise, Numb. xiv. 36, 37.

7. TISRI.

- I. The feast of trumpets, Lev. xxiii. 34. Numb. xxix. 1, 2.
 III. A fast for the death of Gedaliah, whereupon the expulsion of the people, and the utter destruction of the land ensued, Jer. xli. 2.
 VII. A fast for the Israelites worshipping the golden calf, and the sentence which God pronounced against them in consequence of that crime, Exod. xxxii. 6, &c.
 X. The fast of expiation, as some think, in memory of man's fall, and expulsion out of paradise, Lev. xxiii. 19.
 XV. The feast of tabernacles, in memory of their dwelling in tents, in their passage through the wilderness, Lev. xxiii. 34.
 XXIII. The rejoicing for the law; or a feast instituted in memory of the law, which God gave them by the hand of Moses.

8. MARCHESVAN.

- VI. A fast upon the occasion of Nebuchadnezzar's putting out Zedekiah's eyes, after that he had slain his children in his sight, 2 Kings xxv. 7. Jer. lii. 11.

9. CISLEU.

- VI. A fast in memory of the book of Jeremiah torn and burnt by king Jehoiachin, Jer. xxxvi. 23.
 VII. A feast in memory of the death of Herod the Great, a bitter enemy to the sages.
 XXI. The feast of Mount Gerizim, upon their obtaining leave of Alexander the Great to destroy the temple of Samaria, which was situated there.
 XXV. The feast of dedication, namely of the temple, profaned by the order of Antiochus Epiphanes, and repaired and beautified by the care of Judas Maccabeus. This festival Christ honoured with his presence at Jerusalem. It is likewise called the feast of lights, because, during the time of its celebration, the people were used to illuminate their houses, by setting up candles at every one's door. See 1 Mac. iv. 52.; 2 Mac. ii. 16.; John x. 22.

10. TEBETH.

- X. A fast in memory of the siege of Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings xxv. 1.
 XXVIII. A feast for the exclusion of the Sadducees out of the Sanhedrim, where they had once all the power.

11. SHEBETH.

- IV. A fast in memory of the death of the elders who succeeded Joshua, Judg. ii. 10.
 XV. The beginning of the years of trees, when they were first allowed to eat the fruit thereof, after they were four years planted, Lev. xix. 23, &c.
 XXIII. A fast for the war of the ten tribes against that of Benjamin, for the outrage committed upon the body of the Levite's wife, Judg. xx.
 XXIX. A memorial of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, a cruel enemy to the Jews, 1 Mac. vi.

12. ADAR.

Days.

- VII. A fast in remembrance of the death of Moses, Deut. xxxiv. 5.
- XIII. Esther's fast, probably in memory of that which is mentioned in Esther iv. 16.
- XV. A feast in memory of the death of Nicanor, a bitter enemy to the Jews, 1 Mac. xv. 30.
The feast of Parim or Lots; because, when Haman purposed to destroy all the Jews that were in Persia, according to the superstition of the country, he first drew lots, to know on what day of the year it would be best to put his design in execution, from whence the feast in commemoration of their escape, took its name.
- XIII. The dedication of the temple of Zerubbabel, Ezra vi. 16.
- XXVIII. A feast in commemoration of the repeal of the decree whereby the kings of Greece had forbidden the Jews to circumcise their children, to observe the Sabbath, and to reject foreign worship.

When the year consists of thirteen months, here is the place where the second month of Adar, or I'eadar, by way of intercalation, comes in.

JEWISH MONEY.

The custom of making money, of such a form, such an alloy, and such a determinate value, is not so ancient as some may imagine. ¹ The original way of commerce was certainly by way of barter, or exchanging one kind of merchandise for another, as it is the custom, in some places, even to this day. In process of time, such metals as were generally esteemed to be most valuable, were received into traffic, but then the custom was to weigh them out to one another, till, finding the delays and other inconveniences of this method, they agreed to give each metal a certain mark, a certain weight, and a certain degree of alloy, in order to fix its value; but it was a long while before men came into this agreement. The coinage of money among the Persians, Greeks, and Romans, was but of late date; among the Persians, no older than the times of Darius, son of Hystaspes; and among the Grecians, from whom the Romans very probably took it, of the same date with Alexander. We have no traces of this practice among the ancient Egyptians, before the time of the Ptolemies; nor had the Hebrews this custom among them, ² until the government of Simon Maccabeus, to whom Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, granted the privilege of coining his own money in Judea.

Before that time, they made all their payments by weight: and therefore the reader need less wonder, that one and the same word should denote both a certain weight of any commodity, and such a ³ determinate sum of money; what he has to remark is this—⁴ That among the ancients, the proportion of gold to silver was most commonly as ten to one; sometimes it arose to be as eleven to one, sometimes as twelve, and sometimes as thirteen; that though, in the time of king Edward I., it was here in England at so low an estimate as ten to one; yet it is now advanced to the value of sixteen to one, and in all the reductions of this kind that we make, is to be so computed.

¹ Calmet's Dissertation, vol. 1.

² And yet the Jews have a tradition, that not only Joshua, David, and Mordecai, but even Abraham himself, had found out the way of coining. It is said of Abraham indeed, that 'he was very rich in silver and gold, (Gen. xiii. 2.) But we no where read that this money was stamped with any impression; and yet the Jewish tradition runs thus, namely, 'That on Abraham's money were stamped on one side an old man and an old woman, on the other, a young man and a young maid; on Joshua's money, on one side an ox, on the other a monoceros; on David's money, on one side a staff and a scrip, on the other a tower; and on Mordecai's money, on one side sackcloth and ashes, on the other a crown.' But this seems to have the air of a Rabbinical fiction.—Lewis's Antiq. Heb. b. vi.

	l. s. d. q.
The Gerah,	000 00 01 3
The Hebrew Drachm,	000 00 09
Two Drachms made a Bekah,	000 01 06
Two Bekahs made a Shekel,	000 03 00
Sixty Shekels made a Mina,	009 00 00
Fifty Minas made a Talent,	450 00 00
A Talent of gold, sixteen to one,	7200 00 00

JEWISH WEIGHTS

	lb. oz. gr. dec.
The Gerah,	000 00 10 95
The Hebrew Drachm or Zuz,	000 00 54 75
Two Zuzs made a Bekah,	000 00 109½
Two Bekahs made a Shekel,	000 00 219
An hundred Shekels made a Mineth,	050 00 00
Thirty Mineths made a Talent,	1500 00 00

MEASURES OF LENGTH.

	Eng. feet. inch.
The Hebrew Cubit, somewhat more than	0 21
The Zerith, or Span, a little more than	0 10
The Span of a Cubit, a little above	0 7
The Palm, or hand's breadth, somewhat above	0 3
The Fathom, which makes 4 Cubits above	7 0
Ezekiel's Reed, which was 6 Cubits, above	10 0
The ancient Measuring-line, or Chain, which was 80 Cubits above	145 0
A Sabbath's day's journey, 2000 Cubits,	3648 0

	Miles. Paces. Feet.
An Eastern mile, 4000 Cubits,	1 10 0
A day's journey, generally computed much about	33 0 0

MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

Dry Measures.	Liquid Measures.
The Cab contained a quarter of a peck.	The Log came near to our pint.
The Omer or Gnomer in the Hebrew, was the tenth part of an Ephah.	12 Logs made an Hin, which answered our gallon.
The Ephah is computed to be about our Bushel; and the Homer is supposed to be ten.	6 Hins made a Bath, which was about six gallons; and 10 Baths made an Homer, which was 60.

The reader will be pleased to observe, that in the valuation of money, I have chiefly followed Dean Prideaux, in his preface to the first part of his Connection of Sacred and Profane History, and in the reduction of weights and measures, our learned Cumberland; but whoever desires a fuller account of these matters, may consult the said Bishop Cumberland, of the Jewish weights measures, and monies; Mr Brerewood, De ponderibus et pretiis veterum nummorum; Dr Bernard, De mensuris et ponderibus antiquis; and others that have written on this argument, which is not a little difficult and perplexing.

³ For so the word shakel comes from שָׁקַל to weigh; and may properly be interpreted the weight.—Lewis's Antiq. Heb. b. vi.
⁴ Prideaux's Connection, in the preface.

INDEX OF SUBJECTS.

- AARON, brother of Moses, 238; consecrated to the high priest's office, 297; offers sacrifice, which God accepts by fire, 297; his sons Nadab and Abihu destroyed, 297; is rebuked for envying Moses, 299; stays the plague, 302; his rod blossoms, 302 and n.; dies, 314 and n.
- Abarim, mountains of, 351.
- Abel, birth of, 41 and n.; signification of his name, 41, n.; his occupation, 41; his oblation, 41; is murdered by Cain, 43 and n.
- Abigail, Nabal's wife, her prudent conduct to David, 451 and n.; is married to him on her husband's death, 451.
- Abijah succeeds Rehoboam in the kingdom of Judah, 546; makes war against Jeroboam, 546 and n.
- Abimelech, the first king of Gerar, invites Sarah to his bed, 151; is warned of God concerning her, and makes a covenant with Abraham, 152.
- Abimelech, the second king of Gerar, takes Rebecca for Isaac's sister; expostulates with Isaac; his league, 180 and n.
- Abimelech, son of Gideon, murders his brethren, and is elected king of Shechem, 407; flees for his life, 408; returns and destroys Shechem, 408; is killed at the siege of Thebez, 408 and n.
- Abner on the death of Saul proclaims Ishbosheth king, 477; is defeated by Joab; slays Asahel, 477; his death, 478.
- Abraham, his birth, and calling, 112; leaves Uz and Haran; goes to Canaan; the blessing bestowed on him; fixes his tent near Sichem, 143; God appears to him; he removes between Bethel and Hai; goes down to Egypt; his fears on account of his wife; his wife taken into the seraglio of Pharaoh; the king and his nobles plagued on her account, 144 and n.—Abram returns to Canaan; separation of Abram and Lot; Abram has a vision; departs to Mamre, 145; rescues Lot after the battle of Siddim; is blessed by Melchizedek; has another vision from God; receives promise of a son; sacrifices to the Lord, 146 and n.; God's covenant with him; the token and signs, 147 and n.; Sarai presents Hagar to him, who conceives and bears Ishmael, 147; God renews his covenant with him; institutes the rite of circumcision; changes the names of Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah; promises Sarah a son; Abraham entertains three angels, 148 and n.; Sarah promised a son; her incredulity; Abraham intercedes for Sodom; God's promise to him, 149 and n.; removes to Gerar; his wife attracts the notice of Abimelech, 151; the latter is warned concerning her, and expostulates with Abraham; he makes gifts to Abraham and Sarah; Isaac is born; Abraham sends Hagar and Ishmael away, 152 and n.; makes a league with Abimelech, 153; the oath of their covenant, 153, n.; place of the covenant named Beersheba; Abraham builds an altar there, 153; trials of Abraham, 153, n.; the offering of Isaac, 153-4; God forbids the sacrifice, 154; how Abraham knew the appointed place, 154, n.; Sarah dies, 154; is buried in the cave of Machpelah; Abraham sends Eliezer into Mesopotamia to procure a wife for Isaac, 155; takes Keturah to wife, 157; has six sons by her; settles them in Arabia and Syria, 157 and n.; dies, and is buried at Machpelah, beside Sarah, 157 and n.; his religion, 158, n.; passages in his life not free from sin, 158-9; fictions concerning him, 158, n.; his conduct regarding Hagar considered, 159 and n.; is not chargeable with barbarity in expelling Hagar and Ishmael, 161; or cruelty in his purpose of sacrificing Isaac, 161-5; why he interceded for Sodom, 164; trials of his faith, 172; his character as a warrior considered, 173; his address to Isaac when about to offer him, 173, n.; his history verified by profane authors, 175.
- Abraham's bosom, meaning of the expression, 961, n.
- Absalom, slays Amnon for debauching Tamar, 486 and n.; is himself slain by Joab, 491 and n.
- Abyss, supplies water for the deluge, 85.
- Abyssinians, cruel practice of the, 101, n.
- Acceptance of the sacrifice, 42, n.
- Account of things from the Creation to the Flood, 1.
- Achaia, province of, 1105, n.; its extent, 1086 and n.
- Achan's sacrilege and punishment, 367 and n.
- Achish, king of Gath, 452.
- Achor or Arhar, valley of, 368.
- Acra, mount of, 761 and n.
- Aerabatene, country of, 769 and n.
- Acts of the Apostles, (genuine) by whom written; their extent and sufficiency, 1114.
- Acts of the Apostles, (apocryphal) account of them, 1115 and n.
- Adam and Eve, their close union, 15 and n.
- Adam names all living creatures, 7 and n.; his body, formation of, 11, n.; his knowledge and supernatural gifts, 22 and n.; disobedience, 26; an inquiry respecting the age of, 52, n.; the posterity of, to the deluge, 52 and n.; death of, and burial, 53 and n.
- Adam, city of, 365 and n.
- Adonijah aspires to the throne, flies for refuge to the altar, pardoned by Solomon, but afterwards slain, 508.
- Adramalech and Anamalech, 625 and n.
- Adramyttium, town of, 1096 and n.
- Adullam, city of, 448 and n.
- Adultery, punishment of in eastern nations, 212, n.
- Agabus, one of the seventy disciples, 1070 and n.
- Agag saved by Saul; slain by Samuel, and why, 442.
- Agape, feasts of, 1084 and n.
- Agarsp, king of the Scythians, invades Bactria; slays Zoroastres, &c; razes the fire temples, 809.
- Agrirentum, inhabitants of, burn Phalaris in his own bull, 491.
- Agrippa, grandson of Augustus, banished on account of his vicious life, 1130.
- Agrippa, grandson of Herod the Great, persecutes the Christians; and causes James the Great to be beheaded, 1070 and n.; casts Peter into prison, 1070 and n.; puts the keepers of the prison to death, 1071; his death, 1071 and n.
- Agrippa visits Festus, 1094 and n.; Paul is brought before him, 1091 and n.; Agrippa is almost persuaded to be a Christian, 1096 and n.
- Ahab succeeded Omri in Israel, 550; is guilty of all manner of idolatry, 560; marries Jezebel, 560; builds a temple to Baal, in Samaria, 560 and n.; is reproved by Elijah, 561 and n.; is opposed by Benhadad, 566; overcomes him, 566 and n.; is instructed by a prophet to recruit his army, 566; defeats Benhadad a second time, 567; concludes a treaty with him, 567 and n.; his punishment for so doing, 567 and n.; puts Naboth to death and seizes on his vine-

- yard, 568 and n.; Elijah pronounces his punishment for the matter of Naboth, 568 and n.; is slain at the siege of Ramoth Gilead, 570.
- Ahasuerus succeeds Cyrus in his dominions 716; discourages the rebuilding of Jerusalem, 716; his death, 716.
- Ahasuerus, the second, 719 and n.; gives a grand festival at Shushan, his imperial city, 719-20 and n.; resents Vashti the queen's refusal to come to the banquet, and seeks another queen, 720 and n.; marries Esther, 721 and n.; gives a grand feast, 721; visits Esther at her banquet, 723 and n.; rewards Mordecai, 724 and n.; hangs Haman, 725 and n.; reverses the decree against the Jews, 725, n.
- Ahava, river of, 727, n.
- Ahaz succeeds Jotham on the throne of Judah, 627; is reproved and assisted by the prophet Isaiah, 627; the two signs, 627 and n.; he falls into idolatry, 627 and n.; is beset with enemies, 628; bribes the king of Assyria, 628; relapses into idolatry, 629 and n.; his death, 629 and n.
- Ahaziah succeeds Ahab on the throne of Israel, 570; his death, 573.
- Ahaziah succeeds Jehoram in Judah; is slain by Jehu, 596.
- Ahobab, one of the artists employed in building the Mosaic tabernacle, 297.
- Alijah, the prophet, declares Jeroboam successor of Solomon; his conduct; 541, and n.
- Ahimelech, his conspiracy against Saul; his execution, 449 and n.
- Ahitophel joins the rebellion of Absalom, and why; his death, 490.
- AI, city of, 367 and n.
- Ajalon, the miracle there, 388, et seq.
- Akron, see Ekron.
- Alatia of the Egyptians, what, 281.
- Alexander of Ephesus, who he was, and whether a friend to St Paul, 1085.
- Alexander's feast, 699, n.
- Alexander the Great born, 748; succeeds his father, Philip, in Macedonia, 748; appointed to command the Grecian forces against Persia, conquers Darius, 748; subdues Syria; besieges Tyre; requires submission from Galilee, Samaria, and Jerusalem; marches against Jerusalem, 748 and n.; pays reverence to Jaddua the high priest; gives favourable terms to the Jews, 749; departs into Egypt; his governor over Syria and Palestine burnt by the Samaritans, 749; he drives the inhabitants from Samaria and plants there a colony of Macedonians, 749; his death, 749, n.; his kingdom divided amongst his four generals, 758.
- Alexander, a pretended son of Antiochus Epiphanes, claims the throne of Syria, 774 and n.; seeks the friendship of Jonathan by conferring on him the high-priesthood, 774, n.; defeats Demetrius, and so obtains the throne of Syria, 775 and n.; his death, 776.
- Alexander Jannæus succeeds Aristobulus as king of the Jews, 790; his wars and the circumstances thereof, 790 et seq.; destroys Gaza, 791; his treatment at Jerusalem, 791 and n.; is opposed by Demetrius king of Damascus, 792; is reduced to great extremities 792; his cruelties after the siege of Bethome, 792; his artifice to secure favourable treatment to his queen and children, 793; his death, 793.
- Alexandra, queen of Alexander Jannæus, becomes queen of the Jews, 793.
- Alexandria, city of, 752, n.
- Alma, meaning of, 871.
- Altars of burnt offering, 310; of incense, 311.
- Analekite, his message to David, 476.
- Analekites, the, 273; 339 and n.
- Amaziah succeeds Joash in the kingdom of Judah; 602; revenges his father's murder; defeats the Edomites, 602; challenges Joash, 603 and n.; is taken prisoner to Jerusalem, 603 and n.; his death, 603.
- Amenophis, the Pharaoh who pursued Israel, and was drowned, 336.
- America, continent of, how it came to be peopled, 128 and n.
- Ammonites, victory over the, 441.
- Amnon slain by Absalom for debauching Tamar, 486 and n.
- Amon succeeds Manasseh in the kingdom of Judah, 637; restores idolatry; is slain by his domestics, 637.
- Amos the prophet, 608.
- Amphipolis, city of, 1078, n.
- Amram, has a daughter, Miriam, and two sons, Aaron and Moses, by his wife Jochebed, 238; traditions concerning him, 258, n.
- Ananel made high-priest by Herod, 800.
- Ananias the high-priest, his treatment of Paul, 1091.
- Ananias cures Saul of his blindness, 1066.
- Ananias and Saphira struck dead, 1060.
- Ancient authors, their opinions concerning the creation, 11, n.; whose writings authenticate the history of Abraham, 175-6; whose writings verify the history of Jacob from his going into Mesopotamia to his return, 205; who bear testimony to the truth of Joseph's history, 232; their testimony to the truth of what is related concerning Moses, and the Exodus of Israel, 258; whose writings bear testimony to the miraculous pillar; the passage of the Red Sea; the sending down manna and quails; the striking of the rock, 284; the delivering of the law on Mount Sinai, 284; their testimony to Moses; Aaron; Balaam; the brazen serpent, 334.
- Ancient testimonies to the truth of the sacred history from the entrance into Canaan, to the death of Joshua, 385; to the truth of sacred history from the death of Joshua, to the death of Samson, 427; to the things recorded in the 1st book of Samuel, 467.
- Ancient cities, &c. the work of the giants, 59 and n.
- Andrew the apostle suffers martyrdom at Patrea by order of the proconsul, 1105 and n.
- Animal food permitted after the deluge, 96 and n.
- Animals, 13, n.
- Animals such as were worshipped by the Egyptians, 263; their care of them, 263.
- Angel of the covenant, 404.
- Angels probably created before this lower world, 8.
- Anger, its nature considered, 932.
- Anna the prophetess, gives testimony to Christ, 847.
- Antediluvians, their wickedness, arts and sciences, longevity, &c., 69, et seq.
- Anthony is defeated at Actium by Octavius, 801 and n.
- Antigonus son of Aristobulus the second obtains Judea; is besieged in Jerusalem by Herod, 798; his death, 799.
- Antigonus, brother of Aristobulus, is murdered, 790.
- Antioch, city of, 1069, n.; the followers of Christ are there first called Christians, 1070 and n.
- Antiochus, his mad excesses, 700 and n.
- Antiochus the divine, deposes Demetrius the second, 776; is murdered, 777.
- Antiochus Epiphanes succeeds Seleucus in Syria, 755 and n.; oppresses the Jews, 775; besieges Jerusalem, and slaughters 40,000 Jews; pollutes the temple, 756 and n.; forbids the Jews to exercise their religion, 756; the Jewish temple he dedicates to Olympian Jove, and places his statue therein, 757; terribly persecutes the Jews, 757; his defeats by Judas Maccabees, 759 et seq.; his ill success in Persia; his death, 761 and n.
- Antiochus Eupator succeeds Antiochus Epiphanes in Syria, 769; he and his regent Lysias put to death, 772.
- Antiochus the Great, is defeated by Ptolemy Philopater, 753; re-obtains Syria, &c. 753; allows many liberties to the Jews, 753; marries his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes; and gives him as her dower the province of Cæle Syria, and Palestine, 754; his death, 754, n.
- Antiochus the hunter, becomes king of Syria, 777, n.; besieges Jerusalem, 778.
- Antipater, 793.
- Antipater, son of Herod, 802; slain by his father, 802, n.
- Antipatras, town of, 1092, n.
- Antonia, castle of, 1090, n.
- Apamea, city of, 777 and n.
- Apheck, town of, 567 and n.
- Apocalypse, its authenticity, 1112, n.
- Apollonia, city of, 1078, n.
- Apollonius, a general of Antiochus, massacres the Jews, 756.
- Apollonius, 983 and n.
- Apollo teaches in Ephesus, 1082 and n.
- Apologies, their use, 929.
- Apostles, meaning of the name, 904; to whom given by the Jews, 904; those of our Lord, 904; their return to Jerusalem after the ascension, 1057; are filled with the Holy Ghost, 1058; make converts, heal diseases, &c. 1058.
- Appeals, Roman, manner of, 1093.
- Appii Forum, 1099 and n.
- Aprons of fig-leaves, 26 and n.
- Aquila and Priscilla, two of Paul's converts, 1080, n.
- Arabia, 1066, n.
- Arabians, their idolatry, 139; descended from Ishmael; their usages and mode of life, 169; all attempts to subdue them futile, 170 and n.
- Arabs, 147, n.; 770 and n.
- Aram, the sons of; their settlements, 121.
- Ararat, the mountain, 88; account of by professor Parrot, 92; Armenians affirm the impossibility of ascending to its summit, 93; Armenian tradition, that the ark is still existing thereon, 93.
- Aratus the poet, 1079, n.
- Arbacæus conspires against Sardanapalus, 676; lays siege to Nineveh, and drives

- him to the desperate act of burning himself, his palace, &c; obtains the kingdom, 677.
- Arbela, battle of, 750, n.
- Archelaus succeeds Herod in Judea, 849; Jews make complaints against him to Augustus, who deposes him, 850.
- Archers, their service in ancient warfare, 454.
- Areopagus, court of, 1079, n.
- Arctus, king of Arabia, 1066, n.
- Argonauts, their exploits, 501.
- Arphaxad, descendants of; their settlements, 121; king of Media, 660 and n.
- Arimathea, town of, 1021, n.
- Aristarchus, 1088 and n.
- Aristobulus murders his mother and his brothers, 789; causes Antigonus to be slain, 790 and n.; his death, 790 and n.
- Aristobulus son of Alexander Jannæus, succeeds to the government of the Jews, 793; deposes Hyrcanus, is put in chains by Pompey, 794 and n.; his death, 795.
- Aristobus assumes the priesthood and the kingly office amongst the Jews, 780.
- Ark, the building of the, 71 and n.; dimensions and capacity of the, 79, 80, 81.
- Ark of the covenant, 535 and n.
- Ark of the Lord, why said to be at Shechem when it really was at Shiloh, 584; taken by the Philistines, 435; carried to Ashdod and placed in the temple of Dagon, 435; the consequence, 435; is sent back, 436; the Bethshemites for looking into it are slain, 437; is brought to Kirjath-jearim, 437; why carried by the Israelites to their wars, 455; why permitted to be taken, 455; whether seventy Bethshemites slain, 456; why not carried to Shiloh, 456; brought to Jerusalem by David, 480 and n.; Uzzah's punishment for touching it, 480.
- Armenia, mountains of, 88.
- Artaxerxes, 716 and n.; succeeds Ahasuerus, 716 and n.; stops the rebuilding of Jerusalem, 717.
- Artaxerxes Longimanus, 719 and n.; see also Ahasuerus the second, 719.
- Artaxerxes the second succeeds Darius Nothus in Persia, 747 and n.
- Asa succeeds Abijah in the kingdom of Judah, 546; destroys the idols and expels the Sodomites, 547 and n.; vanquishes the king of Arabia, 547 and n.; expels his mother from court for idolatry, 547; obtains assistance from Syria against Israel, 548; dies, 548.
- Asahel killed, 477.
- Ascension of our Lord, 1027 and n.
- Ascents of mount Ararat, 90, 93.
- Ashdod, city of, 344.
- Ashimah, 625 and n.
- Ashur, cities which he built, 134 n.
- Askelon, city of, 344, 412.
- Asmoneans, 757, n.
- Asphaltites, lake of, called also the salt sea and the dead sea, 177-8 and n.; 353; conjectures respecting, 354.
- Ass, that of Balaam, 316; our Saviour rides on one, 971.
- Assideans, 758, n.
- Assos, sea-port of, 1087, n.
- Assyrian empire, history of, 136, n.
- Astaroth the goddess of the Sidonians, 637, n.
- Astarte, idol of the Syrians, 599, n.
- Astronomy, early study of, 67; ancient systems of, 87, 88; various systems of, 126, n.; as known to the Egyptians, 261.
- Assuman, Syrian idol, 599, n.
- Atad, threshing floor of, 224 and n.
- Atē, her story, to what allusive, 24 and n.
- Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, 560 and n.
- Athaliah succeeds her son Ahaziah in Judah, 596; destroys the children of Jehoram, 599; her death, 600 and n.
- Athens, city of, 1078, n.
- Attalia, city of, 1073, n.
- Augustus Caesar banishes his daughter Julia for infamous practices, 1129; also her daughter and his grandson Agrippa for the like, 1129; banishes Ovid, 1129; appoints Tiberius his heir, 1129; regulates the calendar, 1129; his death, 1130; his character; divine honours paid to his memory, 1130.
- Authors who have treated of the Egyptian buildings and monuments, 267.
- Avites, 625 and n.
- Azariah succeeds Amaziah in Judah, 603.
- Azekah, its situation, 443.
- Azotus, its situation, 341.

B

- Baal-berith, 407 and n.
- Baal-peor, 318 and n.
- Baal-zebub, 572.
- Baasha, king of Israel, fortifies Ramah, 548; dies, 549.
- Babel, tower of, 109 and n.; the building thereof interrupted, 110; whether all the descendants of Noah were at the building of, 111 and n.; tower of, 116; heathen testimony establishes the fact of such an erection subsequent to the deluge; its remains still exist; opinion that Nimrod was the projector of the building, 116; tower of, erected as a land-mark for the different tribes and families of men, in anticipation of a dispersion, 118; other reasons for its erection, 120, n.
- Babylon, description of, 133 and n. and 712; passed from the Assyrians to the Persians, 133; thence to the Macedonians, 133; Alexander died there, 133; its population weakened to people Seleucia, 133; now reduced to ruins, having only one town remaining, 133; ruins described, 133, n.
- Babylonians, their astronomical knowledge, 136.
- Bacelides marches with an army into Judæa, 773; overpowers and kills Judas Maccabæus, 773; pursues and overtakes Jonathan, the brother and successor of Judas, 773; goes to Jerusalem, fortifies mount Aera, makes a treaty, and returns to Syria, 774.
- Balaam is sent for by Balak, 315; is met by an angel, 316; reproved by his ass, 316; sacrifices, 316; is compelled to bless the Israelites, 317 and n.; his wicked suggestion to Balak, 317 and n.; on the conduct and character of, 331 et seq.
- Balah, king of Moab, 315.
- Balch, its situation, 809.
- Balista of the Romans, 771, n.
- Banishment of Cain, 41.
- Barak, son of Ahinoam, marches against Sisera, 402 and n.; defeats him, 402 and n.
- Baris, castle of, 779 and n.
- Barjesus the sorcerer, struck blind, 1072.
- Barnabas, St, his labours and death, 1111 and n.
- Barnabas and Mark proceed to Cyprus, 1075.
- Bartholomew, St, his travels, labours and death, 1110 and n.
- Bartimeus restored to sight, 967 and n.
- Baruch, 655, n.
- Barzillai, his conduct to David, 504.
- Bashan, the land of, 315, n.; mountains of, 351.
- Bathsheba married to David, 481; has a son, Solomon, 486.
- Bean, children of, 769 and n.
- Beasts created, 6 and n.; clean and unclean, 72, n.
- Beautiful gate of the temple, 1059 and n.
- Beer, city of, 408 and n.
- Beersheba, meaning of, 153.
- Beginning, meaning of this word as used in the opening of Genesis, 2, n.
- Bel, supposed to be the same with Nimrod, 119.
- Belshis, conspires against Sardanapalus, 576 et seq.
- Bellerophon, 484, n.
- Bells, their use in religious services, 281, n.
- Belsazzar succeeds Laborosoarchod in Babylon, 687 and n.; is besieged by Cyrus, 687; his feast, 687; sees the writing on the wall, 688 and n.; he sends for Daniel, who interprets it, 688; his palace entered by the Medes and Persians; himself slain, 689 and n.
- Belshazzar; see Daniel.
- Belus, tower of, same as tower of Babel; description of, and dimensions, 118, 119 and n.; enlarged by Nebuchadnezzar; is enriched with the spoils of the temple at Jerusalem; is destroyed by Xerxes, 119; Alexander contemplated its restoration, 119; some account of its supposed ruins, 119.
- Belus, temple of, 712; tower of, 260.
- Belus, second king of Babylon, 134; inventor of the Chaldean astronomy, 134; his reign and death, 134; probably the same with Nimrod, 134, n.
- Benhadad invests Samaria, 566 and n.
- Benhadad king of Syria besieges Samaria, 591; Elisha strikes his soldiers with blindness, 591; he is compelled to depart from before Samaria, 593; is murdered by Hazael, 594.
- Benjamites war with the other tribes, 399 and n.; their expedition to obtain wives, 400.
- Benoni, youngest son of Jacob, afterwards called Benjamin, 198.
- Berenice, 1094 and n.
- Bethabara, on the banks of Jordan, 853 and n.
- Bethany, town of, 966 and n.
- Bethel, 144, n.
- Bethesda, pool of, 900, n.
- Bethlehem, city of, 816 and n.
- Bethphage, village of, 971, n.
- Bethsaida, city of, 856 and n.
- Bethshemites slain, 456.
- Bethuel, who he was, 156, n.
- Bethulia, siege of, 659 and n.; its situation, 110, n.
- Bethzura, 760, n.
- Betrothment, 884.
- Berea, city of, 1078, n.
- Berosus, the historian, 61.
- Bezaleel, one of the artists employed in building the Mosaic tabernacle, 297.

Bezek, its situation, &c. 396 and n.
 Biddad, 233, n.
 Billah, 192.
 Birth-right, privileges of, 179, n.
 Blasphemy, first mention of its punishment, 297, 298 and n.
 Blessing of Rebecca, 157.
 Blood, prohibition of, 103.
 Boanerges, 905.
 Boils, the plague of, 246 and n.
 Brazen sea, 310.
 Brazen serpent, 315 and n.
 Bricks, the making of, among the Egyptians, 243, n.
 Britain, aboriginal settlers in, 129, 130 and n.
 Bythynia, country of, 1076, n.

C

Cadmus, who he was, fables concerning him, 260 and n.
 Caesar, Julius, his history and death, 815 et seq.
 Casarea, its situation, 802, n.
 Casarea Philippi, 919 and n.
 Cain, birth of, 41 and n.; nature of the mark set upon him, 46 and n.
 Cain and Abel, objections to the history of, obviated, 45.
 Caleb, one of Joshua's spies, 364, n.
 Caligula succeeds Tiberius in the Roman empire, 1131; his popular measures in the opening of his reign, 1131; his crimes and vices, 1131; assumes the title of Optimus Maximus, and divine honours, 1131; his extravagances and cruelties, 1131 and n.; is murdered by Charas, 1132.
 Calvary, mount, 1017, n.
 Cambyzes; see Ahasuerus, also 716 and n.
 Cana of Galilee, 856, n.
 Canaan, the sons of; their settlements, 122; when inhabited, 135; the land of, 143, n. 341 et seq.; its extreme fruitfulness, 300; mountains of, 345 et seq.; lakes and rivers, 352 et seq.; vineyards of, 357.
 Canaanites, their idolatry, 139.
 Candace, queen of Ethiopia, 1064.
 Candlestick of the tabernacle, 311.
 Capernaum, city of, 857, n.
 Captain of the guard, 1099 and n.
 Carites, see Karaites.
 Carmel, mount, 351.
 Carpus, 1106, n.
 Caspis, city of, 770, n.
 Castle of Cario, built by the Pharaohs, 266.
 Castor and Pollux, the ship in which Paul and his companions sailed from Melita, 1098 and n.
 Cat, the, a sacred animal with the Egyptians, 263, n.
 Catholic epistles, 1102 and n.
 Cattle created, 6 and n.
 Cerops, his story, 260 and n.
 Cedron, brook of, 1007 and n.
 Chaldeans, the, 61 and n.; their skill in astronomy; how accounted for; the notions they conceived respecting the heavenly bodies, 138; their divinations, 213, n.
 Chaos, 2 and n.
 Charehemish, its situation, 639 and n.
 Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, 145 and n.
 Chemosh or Chamos, idol of Moab, 554, and n.
 Cherethites and Pelethites, who they were, 482, n.

Cherith, the brook, 561 and n.
 Chimham, town or station of, 681 and n.
 China, no mention of its first population by Moses, 101.
 Chios, isle of, 1087, n.
 Christ is born at Bethlehem, 846 and n.; is adored by the shepherds, 847; is circumcised, and called Jesus, 847 and n.; is worshipped of the wise men, 848 and n.; in his twelfth year goes up with his parents to Jerusalem to the passover, 850 and n.; he carries behind them, 850 and n.; at the end of three days is found of them in the midst of the Sanhedrim disputing with the doctors, 850 and n.; he returns with them to Nazareth, 851; his early life, 851 and n.; is baptized of John in Jordan, 853-4 and n.; the Holy Ghost descends upon him, 854 and n.; is carried by the Spirit into the wilderness of Judea; fasts forty days and forty nights; is tempted of Satan, 854 and n.; returns to Bethabara, 855; is followed by Andrew, and John, and Simon, and Philip, and Nathaniel of Cana in Galilee, 856 and n.; his declaration to Nathaniel, 856 and n.; Christ and his mother invited to the marriage at Cana, 856 and n.; changes the water into wine, 857 and n.; proceeds from Cana to Capernaum, 857; thence to Jerusalem, 857; he clears the temple of those who profaned it by making it a place of usury and merchandise, 857 and n.; the Jews are incensed; he foretells his own death and resurrection, 858 and n.; is visited by Nicodemus; instructs him, 858 and n.; after the passover Christ, attended by many disciples, goes about Judea teaching and making converts, 859 and n.; passes into Galilee, 860; his interview with the woman of Samaria, 860 and n.; the inhabitants of Sychar invite him into their city, 861; returns to Cana, 861; cures the officer's son, 861; preaches throughout Galilee, 861; enters the synagogue of Nazareth on the sabbath day, 861 and n.; the Nazarenes purpose to destroy him; he miraculously withdraws himself, 862 and n.; removes to Capernaum, 862; the miraculous draught of fishes, 862; he calls to his ministry, Peter, Andrew, James, and John, 863 and n.; casts out an unclean spirit, 863 and n.; cures Peter's wife's mother of a fever, 863 and n.; cures great numbers of their distempers, 864 and n.; leaves Capernaum, and progresses through Galilee, preaching, and curing all that are diseased, 864; heals the leprous man, 864 and n.; retires to a desert place for prayer, 865; returns to Capernaum; cures the sick of the palsy, 865 and n.; the scribes and Pharisees are incensed against him, 866; calls Matthew from the receipt of custom, 866 and n.; eats with the publicans, 866 and n.; the scribes and Pharisees murmur thereat, 866; he answers them, 866 and n.; goes up to Jerusalem to the second passover, 900; heals the paralytic at the pool of Bethesda, 901 and n.; the Jews murmur thereat, he answers them, 901 and n.; is taken before the Sanhedrim as a Sabbath-breaker, 902; his defence of his disciples for plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath, 902 and n.; he returns into Galilee, and heals the man whose hand had withered, 903 and n.; retires to the sea-side to avoid the malice of the Pharisees, 903; names his apostles, 904 and n.; his discourse to them on the mount, 904 and n.; he heals a leper, 905; on his return to Capernaum, heals the centurion's servant, 905; restores the widow's son at Nain, 905 and n.; his reply to the Baptist, 906 and n.; discourses to his disciples regarding John the Baptist, 906; dines with Simon a Pharisee, 907; a woman anoints his feet, 907 and n.; Christ justifies her, 908 and n.; makes a tour through Galilee, and returning to Capernaum, cures a demoniac, 908; the Pharisees attribute his healing power to intercourse with demons, 908 and n.; his sign to the scribes and Pharisees, 909 and n.; teaches the multitude in parables, 909; his parable of the sower; the grain of mustard seed; the pearl of great price, 910 and n.; Christ sleeps in the storm; rebukes the sea and it becomes calm, 911 and n.; cures two demoniacs in the country of the Gadarenes, 911; returning to Capernaum, heals the daughter of Jairus, 912 and n.; heals the woman who had an issue of blood, 912 and n.; cures two men of blindness, 913; gives speech to one dumb, 913; departs from Capernaum into other parts of Galilee, 913; visits Nazareth; leaves it on account of the unbelief, 913; sends out his disciples two and two into the parts of Judea, 914; receives tidings of the Baptist's death, 915; his disciples return to him, 915; instructs and afterwards miraculously feeds the multitude, 915 and n.; walks upon the sea during the storm, 916 and n.; stretches out his hands to save Peter, who is sinking in the waves, 916; stills the waves of the sea, 916; is found of the multitude in the synagogue at Capernaum, 916 and n.; discourses with them concerning the benefits of his death &c., 916 and n.; declares to his disciples that one of them will prove a traitor to him, 917; answers the scribes and Pharisees, who censure him and his disciples for eating with unwashed hands, 917 and n.; heals the daughter of the Syro-Phœnician woman, 918; passes into Decapolis, 918 and n.; cures a deaf and dumb man, and miraculously feeds the four thousand, 918 and n.; reproves the Sadducees and Pharisees at Dalmanutha, who demand of him a sign from heaven, 918 and n.; cautions his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees, 918 and n.; heals the blind man without the gates of Bethsaida, 919 and n.; questions his disciples as to whom they believe him to be, 919; his promise to Peter, 920 and n.; discourses with his disciples regarding his death and resurrection, 921; rebukes Peter for desiring him to refrain from going to Jerusalem, 921 and n.; is transfigured before Peter, James, and John, 922 and n.; assures and encourages them, 922; his discourse thereupon with them, 922 and n.; descending from the mount of transfiguration finds his disciples debating with the scribes, 944 and n.; casts the devils out of the deaf and dumb youth, 944 and n.; discourses thereupon with his disciples, 945 and n.; in the way to Capernaum, discourses with his disciples regarding his death and resurrection, 945 and n.; his disciples dispute about precedence, 945 and n.; he reproves them, 945; calls a little child to him, 946 and n.; his parable of the king and his debtors, 946; his reply to John concerning the stranger who cast out devils in his name, 946 and n.; his reply to Peter concerning the tribute at Capernaum, 946 and n.; his command to Peter thereupon, 946 and n.; is urged by his disciples to go to Jerusalem to the feast of tabernacles, 947 and n.; objects at first to go; afterwards sets forward in a private manner, 947 and n.; the Samaritans refuse lodgings to him and his disciples, 947 and n.; reproves James and John for invoking punishment on the Samaritans, 947 and n.; cures the ten lepers, 948 and n. sends forth seventy disciples by two and two, 948 and n.; teaches openly at Jerusalem during the feast of tabernacles, 948; alludes to the effusion of the Holy Ghost, 948 and n.; the Pharisees desire to have him apprehended, but fail in their object, 949 and n.; the adulterous woman brought before him, 949 and n.; instructs the people, 950; the seventy return to him, 950 and n.; he promises them richer gifts, 950 and n.; his answer to the lawyer, 950 and n.; explains, by a parable, love to our neighbour, 950 and n.; is entertained by Martha at Bethany, 951; his answer to Martha, 951 and n.; delivers "the Lord's prayer" to his disciples, 951; reproves the Pharisees for their regard to externals, 951; by the parable of the rich man, takes occasion to reprove attachment to worldly things, 952 and n.; his observations on the massacre of the Galileans, and the fall of the tower of Siloam, 952 and n.; his parable of the fig-tree, 952 and n.; cures the woman of her infirmity, 953 and n.; reproves the ruler of the synagogue, 953 and n.; goes up to Jerusalem to the feast of dedication, 953 and n.; gives sight to one blind from his birth, 953 and n.; the envy of the Pharisees thereat, 954 and n.; their treatment of him whose sight was restored, 954 and n.; Christ receives him into his church, 955 and n.; reproves the Pharisees under the allegory of the shepherd and the sheep, 955 and n.; through the violence of the Jews is compelled to retire to Bethanah, 956 and n.; his reply to those who inquired what number should be saved, 956 and n.; his exclamations against Jerusalem, 957 and n.; cures the man afflicted with dropsy, 958 and n.; reproves the Pharisee and his friends, for their desire of precedence, 958 and n.; represents the gospel order under the allegory of a feast, 958 and n.; states the qualifications required in those who would become his disciples, 959 and n.; vindicates his familiarity with the publicans by the parable of the hundred sheep, 959 and n.; and the lost piece of silver, 960 and n.; and the prodigal son, 960 and n.; the parable of the unjust steward, 960 and n.; of the rich man and Lazarus, 961 and n.; his reply to the question of divorce, 962 and n.; his parable of the Pharisee and Publican, 963 and n.; warns his disciples against false prophets, &c., 963 and n.; propounds to his disciples the parable of the unjust judge, 964 and n.; crosses Jordan into Perea, and receives little children unto him, 964 and n.; his answer to the rich young man, 965 and n.; the rewards of his followers, 965 and n.; journeys to Judea to raise Lazarus, 966 and n.; going thither he tells his disciples the things that would befall him at Jerusalem, 966 and n.; restores sight to Bartimeus, and another at Jericho, 967 and n.; calls upon Zaccheus, 968 and n.; his parable of the talents, 968 and n.; raises Lazarus from the dead, 969 and n.; the Pharisees conspire against him, 969 and n.; he retires to Ephraim, 970 and n.; is entertained at Bethany by Martha and Mary, 970; defends the behaviour of Mary, 970 and n.; the Jews consult to destroy him, 970 and n.; enters Jerusalem riding on the colt of an ass, 971 and n.; his lamentation over the city, 972 and n.; drives out of the temple those who were making it a seat of merchandize, 994 and n.; the chief priests and Scribes are greatly incensed against him, 994 and n.; Christ curses the barren fig-tree, 996; censures the rulers in his parable of the two sons, the wicked husbandmen, and the marriage guest, 996 and n.; his reply concerning payment of tribute, 997 and n.; explains the doctrine of the resurrection, 998 and n.; exposes the hypocrisy of the Scribes and Pharisees, and laments for Jerusalem, 999 and n.; the widow's mite, 999 and n.; his declaration concerning the temple, 999 and n.; his parables of the faithful servant, the wise and foolish virgins, and the talents, 1001 and n.; he alludes to the final consummation of all things, 1001; washes the feet of his disciples, 1003 and n.; declares that one of the twelve should betray him, 1003; Judas bargains with the saddedrim to deliver up Christ, 1004 and n.; the institution of the last supper, 1005 and n.; Christ warns Peter that he will deny him thrice, 1006 and n.; his agony in the garden, 1007 and n.; is betrayed by Judas to the chief priests and others, 1008 and n.; heals the high priest's servant whose ear Peter had struck off, 1009 and n.; his disciples desert him, 1009 and n.; is brought before Annas, and by him sent to Caiaphas, 1010; declares himself the Messiah, and is accused of blasphemy, 1010; is ill treated by the high priest's servants, 1010; is denied of Peter, 1011 and n.; is carried before Pontius Pilate, 1011 and n.; Judas repents of his perfidy towards him, 1011 and n.; Pilate declares that there is nothing worthy of death in him, 1013; sends him to Herod, 1013 and n.; who returns him to Pilate in a robe of mockery, 1014 and n.; Barabbas the robber is preferred before him, 1014 and n.; is mocked and scorned, 1014 and n.; is exculpated by Pilate, who washes his hands in token of his innocence, 1015 and n.; and refuses to sentence him, 1016; the Jews take his blood upon themselves, 1016 and n.; he is led forth to be crucified bearing his cross, 1016 and n.; is crucified on Calvary, between two thieves, and a derisive inscription set over him, 1017 and n.; his mantle divided by the soldiers, and lots cast for his coat, 1017 and n.; his promise to the penitent thief, 1018 and n.; consigns his mother to the care of John, 1018; the miraculous phenomena attending his crucifixion, 1019 and n.; he calls upon God, 1019 and n.; dies, 1020 and n.; the Roman soldier pierces his side, 1021 and n.; his body delivered to Joseph of Arimathea; he and Nicodemus embalm it, 1021 and n.; it is buried in Joseph's sepulchre, 1022 and n.; the sepulchre guarded, 1022 and n.; Mary Magdalene and others visit the sepulchre; find the stone rolled away; and an angel declares to them the resurrection of Christ, 1022; Christ appears to Mary Magdalene in the garden; she makes known the resurrection to the apostles, 1023 and n.; the Roman soldiers are bribed to say that whilst they slept the body was stolen, 1023 and n.; Christ joins the two disciples on their way to Emmaus, 1023 and n.; breaks bread with them and reveals himself to them, 1024 and n.; Christ enters to his disciples whilst at supper, and eats with them, 1024 and n.; convinces the incredulity of Thomas, 1025 and n.; appears to Peter and John, and others, on the lake Tiberius; the miraculous draught of fishes, 1025 and n.; eats and converses with Peter and the rest, 1026 and n.; meets the eleven, and five hundred of the brethren, on a mountain in Galilee, and instructs them there, 1026 and n.; again joins his apostles and others; promises the gift of the Holy Ghost; leads them forth to Mount Olivet, 1027 and n.; his visible ascent into heaven, 1027 and n.; his doctrine, and the excellency of his religion, 1046, et seq.

Christians, the followers of Christ, so called first at Antioch, 1070 and n.

Chronology, variations reconciled, 130.

Chronology of the period from the promise to Abraham, to the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, 258.

Chronology and profane history of the period from the death of Josiah to the Babylonish captivity, 671 et seq.

Circumcision; the rite explained, 171; manner of performing, 171, n.; Egyptians said to have practised it, 171; how it passed from one people to another, 172; intention of the rite, 172.

Cicero's opinion of the heavenly bodies, 12.

Cilicia, country of, 1066 and n.

Cities of refuge, 320 and n.

Claudius proclaimed emperor by the Roman soldiery, 1132; commences his reign in a praiseworthy manner, 1132; his public works, 1132; his subsequent vices and stupidity, 1132; marries his niece Agrippina, who procures the adoption of her son Nero as successor to Claudius, 1132; she conspires against him, and procures him to be poisoned, 1132.

Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, 801.

Closing the eyes of the dead, 219, n.

Clothes, custom of rending, 210, n.

Clothing of Adam and Eve, 27 and n.

Cnidus, city of, 1097, n.

Coat, Joseph's described, 208, n.; brought to Jacob, 210 and n.

Colomannus, 748; see also Darius.

Coffin, body of Joseph preserved in a, 225 and n.

Cohen, signification of the term, 259, n.

College of Alexandria, 751 and n.
 Colosse, city of, 1100, n.
 Computation of time, from the creation to the deluge, 63; disputes concerning, 63, 64, 65 and n.
 Concubines, 147, n.
 Confusion of languages, 109.
 Confusion of languages, and the Dispersion, difficulties and objections regarding, explained and answered, 110.
 Coniah; see Jehoiachin.
 Consecration by pouring oil, 207, n.
 Converts of St Paul in the palace of Claudius, 1100 and n.
 Coos, island of, 1088, n.
 Corinth, city of, 1080, n.
 Cornelius, his conversion, 1068.
 Covenant made by God with Noah, 70 and n.
 Creation of the world, 1; works of, described by Moses in a popular and simple manner, 3; the history of the, 4; first day of, 4.
 Creeping things created, 6 and n.
 Crete, island of, 1075, n.
 Crispus, one of St Paul's converts, 1081.
 Crocodile worshipped by the Egyptians, 263, n.
 Crucifixion, 1017 et seq.
 Ctesias, the historian, his character, 137, n.
 Cush, land of, 19 and n.
 Cush, the sons of; their settlements, 122.
 Cuthath, 624 and n.
 Cyaxares; see Darius.
 Cyprus, island of, 1060 and n.
 Cyrene, city of, 1069, n.
 Cyrus besieges Babylon, 687; defeats the Babylonians under Neriglissar, 687; takes the city of Babylon, and slays Belshazzar, 689 and n.; marries the daughter of Darius, and ultimately succeeds to the united kingdoms of Media, Persia and Babylon, 690 and n.; permits the Jews to return to their own country, and rebuilds their temple, and restores the sacred vessels, 690 and n.; his death, 694 and n.

D

Dagon, the idol, 414; falls before the ark, 436 and n.
 Dalmanthia, 918 and n.
 Damascus, city of, 628, n.
 Dan, tribe of, 397.
 Danaus, history of, 260 and n.
 Daniel, carried captive to Babylon, 656; surnamed the Belteshazzar, 657; excels in Babylonian learning, 683; becomes skilful at interpretation, 683; relates to Nebuchadnezzar the circumstances of his dream, 683 and n.; interprets the second dream, 686 and n.; his dream of the four beasts, 687; his vision of the ram and the he-goat, 687; interprets the writing on the wall, 688 and n.; is cast into the den of lions, 689; his vision of the seventy weeks, and the return from captivity, 690; his subsequent life; his death, 692, n.; and tomb, 693.
 Darius obtains the kingdom of Babylon, 689; causes Daniel to be thrown into the den of lions, 689; punishes his accusers, 689 and n.; obtains the throne of Persia, 748; is vanquished and taken captive by Alexander, 748; his death, 750, n.
 Darius Hystaspes, or Darius the second, succeeds Artaxerxes as king of Persia, 717 and n.; he permits the Jews to proceed with their buildings, 717 and n.; his death, 718 and n.; his sons, 719 and n.

Darkness, the plague of, 246 and n.

David is anointed king and successor to Saul, by Samuel, 443 and n.; is sent for to play before Saul, and is made one of his armour bearers, 443; slays Goliath, 444, and n.; Sam envies him, and attempts his life, 445; he escapes to Samuel, 446; retires to Gath and counteracts madness, 448; he defeats the Philistines at Keilah, 449 and n.; cuts off the skirt of Saul's robe, 450 and n.; marries Abigail, wife of Nabal, 451 and n.; spares the life of Saul, 452; defeats the Amalekites, 453 and n.; is anointed king of Judah, 477; on the death of Abner, becomes king of Israel, 479 and n.; takes Jerusalem from the Jebusites, 479 and n.; gives a great defeat to the Philistines, 480; brings back the ark to Jerusalem, 480 and n.; his palace furnished by Hiram, king of Tyre, 481; his successes against the Philistines, Moabites, &c., 481; the officers of his court, 482 and n.; defeats the Ammonites, 483; is enamoured of Bathsheba, 483; causes Uriah, her husband, to be slain, 483 and n.; destroys Rabhah, and puts the inhabitants to torture, 484; marries Bathsheba, 484 and n.; is reproved by Nathan, 481 and n.; his child by Bathsheba dies, 485 and n.; has his second son, Solomon, by Bathsheba, 486 and n.; is opposed by his son, Absalom, 488 and n.; mourns for Absalom, 503 and n.; he crosses the Jordan and proceeds to Jerusalem, 504; the tribes revolt from him, 504; his country afflicted with famine, 505; he numbers the people, 506 and n.; is punished with a pestilence, which destroys 70,000 of his subjects, 507 and n.; falls sick, 507; Adonijah, his son, conspires for the throne, 508; he declares Solomon his successor, 508 and n.; dies, 510.

Day and night, distribution of, 4.

Deacons appointed in the primitive church, 1062 and n.

Dead Sea, 353; quality of its waters, 354 and n.

Death of the first born, 247-S.

Deborah, nurse of Rebecca, 157.

Deborah counsels the Israelites against Sisera, 401 and n.; sings a song of triumph on the overthrow of Sisera, 403 and n.

Decalogue pronounced by God from Sinai, 275.

Decapolis, cities of, 918 and n.

Deity worshipped in the early times in the same manner by all nations, 138.

Delilah beguiles Samson, 413.

Deluge, history of the, 70; calendar of, 73, n.; its reality proved from natural history, 83; natural causes of the, 85 et seq.; in all countries there exists a belief of the, 88.

Demetrius ascends the throne of Syria, 772; opposes Judas Maccabaeus, 772; his army defeated by Judas, 773 and n.; defeats Judas, 773; is slain in battle against Alexander, 775 and n.

Demetrius the second, becomes king of Syria, 776; his death, 779.

Demetrius, the silver-smith of Ephesus, raises a tumult against Paul, 1084 and n.

Den of thieves, the expression considered, 994, n.

Destroying angel, 248.

Devils possessing women, remarks concerning, 56.

Dial of Ahaz, 645; the sun's going back thereon, 646.

Diana, the goddess, 1085 and n.; image of, 1085 and n.

Dinah is deflowered by Shechem, 197.

Dionysius the Areopagite, 1080, n.

Dispersion of the people, 110 and n.

Dispersion and first settlement of the nations, 121; difficulties and objections regarding, explained and answered, 123.

Dispersion and settlement of the nations, the sacred chronology, profane history, letters, learning, religion, idolatry, &c., during this period, 130.

Divine worship, general assemblies for, instituted, 53 and n.

Divination by the cup, 229, n.

Divining cup, 217, n.

Divorcees, 962 and n.

Dogs, their numbers in the East, 596, n.

Domitian succeeds Titus in the Roman empire, 1140; his conduct commendable in the commencement of his reign, 1140; assumes the name of Germanicus, and, elated by the victories of his generals, requires divine honours to be paid him, 1141; his enormities and cruelties to the Christians, 1141; a conspiracy is formed against him; his death, 1142.

Dothan, its situation, 209, n.

Dreams, ordinarily employed by God, in the early ages, as a medium of revelation, 205; interpretation of, 696, n.

Dress of the priests, 311 and n.

Drusilla, wife of Claudius Felix, 1093 and n.

E

Ear-rings, remarks concerning them, 197, n.

Earth, and its inhabitants, a source of wonder and admiration, 13; changes wrought therein after the fall, 27 and n.

Eating, manner of, with the Egyptians and ancient nations, 217, n.

Ecbatan, or Ecbatana, city of, 660 and n.

Eden, garden of, 15 and n.; its situation, 16; not an imaginary paradise, but a real locality, 18; description of, 18; its signification, 18; different supposed sites of, 18.

Edomites, the posterity of Esau, 182, n.

Egypt, how divided, 219, n.; early history of, 259 and n.

Egyptians, antiquity of the, 62 and n.; began to consider the sun and moon as Deities, 138; their dislike of shepherds, 219, n.; their chronology, profane history, learning, religion, idolatry, monumental works, &c., during the captivity of the Israelites, 258 et seq.; their learning, 261.

Ekron, city of, 573, n.

Elah succeeds Baasha in Israel, 549; is slain by Zimri, 549.

Elicazr succeeds Simar in the priesthood, 751; employs the Seventy to translate the books of the law for Ptolemy, 751 and n.; his persecution and death, 757

Elezazar the martyr, 757.
 Eleazar, brother of Judas Maccabeus, slays a royal elephant, but is crushed to death by it, 783.
 El Ghor, valley of, 353, n.
 Eli, son of Elkanaah, 433; Samuel is born to him, 434; his sons Hophni and Phinehas slain, 435; falls lifeless on learning that the sacred ark is captured, 435.
 Eliakim; see Jehoikim.
 Eliezer, his oath to Abraham, 155 and n.; comes to Haran in quest of a wife for Isaac, 155; meets with Rebecca, 156; reveals his errand to Laban, 156; presents Rebecca with jewels, 156 and n.; returns to Isaac with Rebecca, 157.
 Elihu one of Job's friends, 234, n.
 Elijah, 560 and n.; is sent to Ahab, 561 and n.; retires to the brook Cherith, 561; is fed by ravens, 561; dwells with a widow at Zarephtha, 561 and n.; blesses the meal and oil, and restores the widow's son, 561 and n.; goes again to Ahab, 561; charges Ahab with his idolatry, 562; challenges the priests of Baal, 562; ridicules their idols, 563 and n.; God accepts his sacrifice, 564 and n.; prays for rain, 564 and n.; Jezebel threatens his life, 564 and n.; he retires to Beersheba, 564; is cheered by an angel, 565; retires to a cave in mount Horeb, 565 and n.; is commanded in a vision to return by Damascus into his own country, 565 and n.; meeteth Elisha 565 and n.; casts his mantle on him, 565 and n.; is translated to heaven, 573.
 Elimelech, 403.
 Eliphaz, who he was, 234, n.
 Elisha follows Elijah, 566; Elijah is separated from him and taken up into heaven, 574 and n.; he sweetens the waters of Jericho, 574 and n.; is mocked of the children, 575; succeeds Jehoram and his allies, 575 and n.; returns to Samaria, where he wrought several miracles, 576; cures Naaman's leprosy, 577 and n.; reproves and punishes Gehazi, 577 and n.; goes to Damascus to declare Hazael king of Syria, 591; anoints Jehu king of Israel, 594; his death, 604; miracle wrought after his death, 604 and n.
 Elizabeth is pregnant of the Baptist, 842; salutes Mary, 844 and n.; is delivered of her son, 844.
 Elymais, temple of, 761 and n.
 Embalming, manner of, among the Egyptians, 224, n.
 Emerods, the plague of, 436 and n.
 Emmaus, village of, 759, n.; 1023.
 Encampments of the Israelites, 269, n.
 Endor, witch of, 453 and n.
 Engedi, village of, 450 and n.
 Engines of assault, 771 and n.
 Enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, 34 and n.
 Enoch and his posterity, 41; translation of, 53; his character and translation, 59, 60.
 Enoch, son of Cain, 44 and n.
 Ephesus, city of, 1084, n.
 Ephod, the, 311.
 Ephraim, town of, 970, n.
 Ephron, city of, 770.
 Epaphras, 1104, n.
 Epaphroditus, 1100, n.
 Epicureans, 1079, n.
 Epirus, province of, 1105, n.

Equipage for horses and asses, 153, n.
 Erastus, a convert of St Paul, 1083, n.
 Esarhaddon succeeds Sennacherib in the kingdom of Assyria, 633.
 Esau sells his birth right, 179; meaning of his name, 179, n.; his marriage, 181; his father's prophecy concerning him, 182; purposes revenge upon his brother, 187; the last mention made of him by Moses, 195, n.
 Eshcol, valley of, 300.
 Essenes, their origin and tenets, 787.
 Esther is brought to the court of Ahasuerus, 720; greatly pleases him, 721; is raised to the throne, 721 and n.; invites the king and Haman twice to her banquet, 723 and n.; causes Mordecai's advancement, and Haman's disgrace, 724-5.
 Etham, probably two places of that name, 288.
 Eth-baal, 560 and n.
 Ethiopia, 1064 and n.
 Eunuch, 1064, n.
 Eunuchs, observations concerning, 228.
 Euphrates, the river, 20 and n.
 Eurodyon, the wind so called, 1097 and n.
 Evangelist, meaning of the term, 840, n.
 Evangelists and their writings, concerning the, 887, et seq.
 Eve, her qualifications, 10 and n.; her disobedience, 25 and n.; tradition respecting the children of, 46, n.
 Evilmerodach succeeds Nebuchadnezzar on the throne of Babylon, 657 and n.; releases Jehoiachin from bondage; his death, 686 and n.
 Expiation, the feast of, 692 and n.
 Expulsion from paradise, 28 and n.
 Ezekiel, the prophet, 658; foretells the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, 659; manner of his death, 682, n.
 Ezion Geber, 538 and n.
 Ezra, 726 and n.; obtains leave of Ahasuerus to go to Jerusalem, taking all of his nation willing to accompany him, 726; delivers the offerings to the temple, 727 and n.; causes the Jews to put away their strange wives and their issue by them, 728; succeeds Zerubbabel in the administration of affairs, 728.

F

Fair Havens, the, 1097, n.
 Fall of man, 24; its consequences to our first parents, 26 and n.; objection respecting, obviated and refuted, 28-31.
 Fallen angels, 24 and n.
 Felix, Claudius, 1092, n.; listens to Paul's preaching, 1093.
 Festus succeeds in the government of Judea, 1093; brings Paul before Agrippa, 1094.
 Fig-tree, description of, 1059, n.
 Firmament or expansion, 4; contrived in wisdom, 13.
 Fire attests the presence of Deity, 280, n.
 Fire of the tabernacle to be kept constantly burning, 297; how this was effected, 297.
 Fire worshippers, 808 and n.
 First-born, its scriptural signification, 845, n.
 Fish created, 5 and n.
 Fixed stars form no part of the Mosaic creation, 5, n.
 Flaming sword, the, 28 and n.
 Flesh not eaten before the flood, 42, n.

Flies, the plague of, 245 and n.
 Flowers, &c., the strewing of, 972, n.
 Foli, fictions concerning him, 101.
 Forbidden fruit, its qualities, 35.
 Fowl created, 5 and n.
 Frogs, the plague of, 245 and n.

G

Gadarenes, country of, 911 and n.
 Galatia, province of, 1075, n.
 Galba, (Sergius) succeeds Nero in the Roman empire, 1134 and n.; principles of his government, 1134; adopts Piso as his successor, 1135; who is executed by Otho, 1135; death of Galba, 1135.
 Galilee, province of, 860 and n.
 Gallio, pro-consul of Achaia, 1081, n.
 Gamaliel, the pharisee, 1061 and n.
 Games of the heathens, 1085 and n.
 Gates of cities anciently the places of judicature, 155, n.
 Gath, city of, 345.
 Gaza, city of, 344, 413 and n.
 Gedaliah, 665, n.; appointed governor of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, 665; slain by Ishmael, 681 and n.
 Gehazi deceives Elisha respecting Naaman; is punished, 577 and n.
 Gehenna, 920, n.
 Gemesareth, lake of, 352.
 Genesis, book of, 1; to be taken in its literal meaning, 36.
 Geological evidence of the deluge, 75, 83.
 Gerar, city of, 151, n.
 Gergesenes, country of, 911, n.
 Geshur, its situation, 486, n.
 Getsemane, 1097 and n.
 Gezer, its situation, 551.
 Giants, birth of the, 51; inquiry concerning the, 58 and n.
 Gilbeal, its situation, 399.
 Gideon, son of Joash; an angel acquaints him with God's purpose to rescue the Israelites through him, 404 and n.; destroys the groves and altars of Baal, 404; the token of the flood, 405 and n.; defeats the Midianites with 300 men, 406 and n.; slays the Midianitish kings and princes, 406 and n.
 Gihon, the river, 19 and n.
 Gilboa, mountains of, 351.
 Gilead, father of Jephthah, 409.
 Gilead, Jacob's monument, 223, n.
 Gilgal, its situation, 365 and n.
 Gods of the Egyptians, 262 and n.
 Gog and Magog, 703 and n., et seq.
 Golgotha, 1017, n.
 Goliath defies the armies of Israel; is slain by David, 444.
 Gomer, the sons of, their settlements, 121.
 Gomorrah, city of, destroyed, 151, n.
 Goshen, land of, where situated, 219, n.
 Grapes, their astonishing size, &c., 500 and n.
 Guarding prisoners, manner of, amongst the Romans, 1099, n.
 Gregory's similitude illustrating the image of God in man, 21.

II

Habbakuk, the prophet, 654, n.
 Hadassah, 720 and n.; see also Esther.
 Hagar is presented by Sarai to Abram, 147; is comforted by an angel, 147; and her son is driven forth by Abraham, 152; an angel appears to Hagar and succours her and Ishmael, 153.

Haggai, the prophet, 717, n.
 Hai, 144, n.
 Hail, the plague of, 246 and n.
 Ham, the sons of, their settlements, 121.
 Hamath, 625 and n.
 Haman, his anger against Mordecai for refusing him reverence, 721 and n.; resolves on his destruction, 721 and n.; procures from Ahasuerus a decree against the Jews, 722 and n.; is invited to the banquet by Esther, 723 and n.; erects a gibbet on which to hang Haman, 724 and n.; unknowingly solicits honours for Mordecai, 724 and n.; is hanged on the gibbet which he had erected for Mordecai, 725.
 Hanging gardens of Babylon, 713.
 Hannibal, some events of his life; his death, 811 and n.
 Haran, or Charan, city of, 123 and n.; its situation, 191, n.
 Haroseth, its situation, 402, n.
 Havilah, land of, 19.
 Hazeal succeeds Benhadad in Syria, 594.
 Hazor, city of, 401, n.
 Heathen history, chronology, religion, learning, longevity, &c. of the Antediluvians, 61.
 Heaven, its scriptural signification, 2 and n.
 Heavenly bodies, worship of, how it arose, 139.
 Hebron, 477 and n.
 Hebron, its situation, 413, n.
 Heliiodorus attempts to plunder the treasury in the Jewish temple; manner of his repulse, 755; poisons Seleucus, 755.
 Helius, a governor of Rome, 1107.
 Hellenists, 1061, n.
 Hell, gates of, 920, n.
 Herbs and fruits created, 5 and n.
 Heresies of Menander, Cerinthus and Ebion, 1113, n.
 Herod Antipas, causes John the Baptist to be beheaded, 914.
 Herod the Great puts down the thieves of Galilee, 796; is compelled to leave Jerusalem, 798; besieges Jerusalem, 799; takes it, 799; obtains full possession of Judea, 799; puts to death the members of the Sanhedrim, 799 and n.; murders Aristobulus, 800 and n.; is summoned before Anthony, 800 and n.; murders his uncle Joseph through jealousy of Mariamne, 801; kills Hyrcanus, 801; is confirmed in the kingdom of Judea by Octavius, 801; kills Mariamne in a fit of jealousy, 801; strangles his sons, 802 and n.; builds two cities in honour of Augustus, and otherwise flatters him, 802 and n.; provokes the Jews by introducing heathenish ceremonies, and profaning the temple, 803 and n.; an attempt to assassinate him, 803 and n.; restores the Jewish temple, 803 and n.; assembles the Sanhedrim, and demands of them where Christ should be born, 848 and n.; sends the wise men to Bethlehem, 848 and n.; slays the children in Bethlehem and the neighbourhood, 849 and n.; his dreadful death, 849 and n.; the division of his kingdom, 849.
 Herodians, their origin and tenets, 887, and n.
 Herodias, some account of her, 859, 914, n.
 Herod's judgment hall, 1092 and n.
 Hezekiah succeeds Abaz on the throne of Judah, 629 and n.; a worthy and religious prince, 629; effects a thorough reformation in religion, 630 and n.; revives the passover, 631 and n.; destroys the brazen serpent, 631 and n.; his successes in war, 632; is reprieved from death, 632 and n.; pays a tribute to Sennacherib, 633; his death, 633.

 Hiddekel, the river, 20.
 Hiel rebuilds Jericho, 560 and n.; is punished for doing so, 560.
 Hieroglyphics, Egyptian, 262 and n.
 Hieroglyphic writing, 699.
 High Priest, his duties, 311.
 Hinnon, valley of, 627, n.
 Hiram furnishes men and materials to Solomon for the building of the temple, 513.
 History of the sufferings of the Israelites, and their deliverance out of Egypt, 236, et seq.; of events from the Exodus of Israel, to their entrance into the land of Canaan, 268, et seq.; of events from the building of the tabernacle to the death of Korah, &c., 297, et seq.; from the death of Korah to the Israelites' entrance into Canaan, 313 et seq.; of events from their entrance into Canaan, to the building of the temple, 361; of the Israelites from their entrance into Canaan to the death of Joshua, 363; of events from the death of Joshua to the death of Samson, 395; of events from the birth of Samuel to the death of Saul, 433; of events from the death of Saul to that of Absalom, 476, et seq.; sacred chronology and profane history during this period, 499 and n.; of events from the death of Absalom to the building of the temple, 502, et seq.; of events from the building of the temple to the Babylonish captivity, 533, et seq.; from the finishing of the temple to the reign of Jehoshaphat, 535, et seq.; of events from the siege of Samaria, to the death of Uzziah, 591 and n., et seq.; of events from the death of Uzziah, to the death of Josiah king of Judah, 622, et seq.; of events from the death of Josiah, to the Babylonish captivity, 653, et seq.; of events from the Babylonish captivity, to the birth of Christ, 679, et seq.; from the captivity, to the death of Cyrus, 680, et seq.; of events from the death of Cyrus, to that of Nehemiah, 716, et seq.; of events from the death of Nehemiah, to the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, 746, et seq.; of events from the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, to that of John Hyrcanus, 769, et seq.; from the death of John Hyrcanus, to the birth of JESUS CHRIST, 789, et seq.; of events from the birth of Christ, to the beginning of the first passover, 840, et seq.; of events from the beginning of the second passover, to our Lord's transfiguration, 900, et seq.; of events from our Lord's transfiguration, to his last entry into Jerusalem, 944, et seq.; of events from our Lord's last entry into Jerusalem, to his ascension 994, et seq.; of events from the ascension of Christ, to the completion of the canon of the New Testament, 1057, et seq.; of the fall, remarks on, 37; of the life of Jacob, from his going into Mesopotamia, to his return, 189, et seq.; of the life of Joseph, including Jacob's life, from his return out of Mesopotamia, 189, et seq.; of the life of Isaac from his marriage to his death, 179, et seq.

Holofernes besieges Bethulia, 660; slain by Judith, 661 and n.
 Holy Ghost, descent of, in the form of a dove, 854, n.; descent of, on the day of Pentecost, 1058 and n.
 Holy of holies, 310.
 Holy place, 310.
 Hor, mount of, 314 and n.
 Horeb, its situation; other particulars concerning it, 240, n. and 280, n.
 Horses of the sun, 637 and n.
 Hosanna, 972, n.
 Hosea, the prophet, 608.
 Hoshea obtains the throne of Israel, 624 and n.; is carried captive by Salmaneser, 624.
 Human language, its imperfections, 55, n.
 Hydri, 333, n.
 Hymeneus is excommunicated by St Paul, 1105 and n.
 Hyrcanus, romantic circumstances of his birth, 754 and n.; his mission to Ptolemy Epiphanes, and his conduct therein, 754; his death 754.
 Hyrcanus, son of Alexander Jannæus, circumstances of his history, 793, et seq.
 Hyrcanus, son of Simon, is declared high-priest of the Jews, 778 and n.; is besieged in Jerusalem by Antiochus, and compelled to submit to terms of capitulation, 779 and n.; relieves the Jews from the Syrian subjection, 779; takes Samaria, 780; his death 780.

I

Iconium, city of, 1072, n.
 Idolatrous worship, motives which led to its first adoption, 139-40; its extent, 140, n.
 Idolatry of the Egyptians, 261.
 Ignatius, St, 946.
 Illyricum, province of, 1086, n.
 Image of God in man, 21 and n.
 Images of the Ephesians, 1084 and n.
 Image of Nebuchadnezzar, description of; supposed to be the same with a colossal statue of gold, taken from the temple of Belus by Xerxes, 119 and n., 684 and n.
 Image worship, first design of, 140; reflections on its futility, 140-41.
 Imposition of hands, 221, n., 1071, n.
 Innocence, the state of, 15; how long preserved, 28-29.
 Inquiring of the Lord, method of, 179, n.
 Inns, description of, 846, n.
 Isaac, the weaning of, 160; his age at the offering, 173; his age when he married Rebecca, 179; comes to Gerar; is blessed of God, 180; represents Rebecca to be his sister; is reproved by Abimelech, and pardoned for his deception, 180; his prosperity in Gerar excites envy, and Abimelech's subjects fill up the wells which Abraham had digged, 180 and n.; Isaac settles at Beersheba; is blessed again of God, and builds an altar there, 181; enters into a league with Abimelech, 181; purposes blessing Esau, 181; blesses Jacob, 182 and n.; prophecies concerning Esau, 182; forbids Jacob marrying with the Canaanites, 183; dies and is buried in the same sepulchre with Abraham, 183.
 Isaiah, the prophet, 608 and n.
 Ishbosheth is proclaimed king on the death of Saul, 477.
 Ishmael is born; character of his posterity, 147 and n.; the promise made to him, 148; his marriage, and progeny, 153 and n.; the prophecy concerning, 169; explained, 169; verified, 169.

Ishmael the son of Nathaniah, slays Gedaliah, 681; escapes into Ammon, 681.

Israel, kingdom of, its end, 625 and n.

Israelites, greatly oppressed by Pharaoh in Egypt, 236 and n.; taskmasters set over them to urge their labours, 237; their prolific increase, 237 and n.; their male children to be destroyed, and their female offspring preserved, 237; and why, 237, n.; conduct of the midwives, 237 and n.; 'making the midwives' houses,' 237 and n.; encamp at Elem, 271; remove thence to the wilderness of Sin, 271; the fall of quails, 271; of manna, 272 and n.; the Israelites rest on the sabbath, 272 and n.; they rebel at Rephedim; are miraculously supplied with water, 272 and n.; battle with the Amalekites under Joshua, 273; advance to mount Sinai, 273; receive a gracious message from God by Moses, 274; forbidden to approach mount Sinai, while Moses holds converse with God, 274; behold the fire and smoke on mount Sinai, 275; the decalogue pronounced to them, 275 and n.; they beseech Moses to speak to God in their stead, 275; compel Aaron to make them gods, 276; he makes them a molten calf, 276 and n.; they worship it, 276 and n.; the idolaters slain by the tribe of Levi at Moses's command, 277; are reconciled to God, at Moses's intercession, 277; the geography of their passage across the Red sea, &c., 288; being afraid of the Canaanites, purpose a return to Egypt, 300 and n.; judgments pronounced against them, 300, and n.; they join battle with the Amalekites, and Canaanites, and are defeated, 300-1; enter Canaan or the Holy land, and are repulsed by Arad, 313; advance to mount Hor, 314; thence to Talmah, 314; are plagued with serpents, 314 and n.; healed by looking on the brazen serpent, 315 and n.; reach the country of the Amorites, 315; are denied passage through their country, 315 and n.; overcome them, 315; advance to the plains of Moab, 315; are seduced by the Moabitish women to worship Baal-Peor, 318; their punishment, 318 and n.; settled in Canaan under the guidance of Joshua, 361; after the death of Joshua had no general leader, 396; the tribe of Judah and Simeon defeats the king of Bezek, 396; they proceed to Jerusalem, and put the inhabitants to the sword, and destroy the city by fire, 396; all the tribes obtain full possession of the lands allotted them, 397; they fall into the idolatry of the Canaanites, 397; they are laid under tribute by the king of Mesopotamia, 397; are relieved by Othniel; the tribe of Dan takes possession of the country of Laish, 398; war between the Benjamites and other tribes, 399 and n.; how the Benjamites obtained wives, 400; Israelites on the death of Othniel revolt from God; Ehud kills the king of Moab, 400; the Israelites destroy the Moabites, 400; in the eastern part of Canaan, enjoy peace, 401; those in the west harassed by the Philistines, 401; are relieved by Shamgar, 401 and n.; those in the north commit idolatry, 401;

God permits Jabin king of Canaan to oppress them for forty years, 401 and n.; Sisera his general is sent against them, 401 and n.; whose forces are overcome by Deborah's counsel, 402 and n.; have peace forty years after the destruction of Sisera, 403; they rebel against God: he visits them with famine, 403; after the death of Deborah and Barak, fall again into impiety, 404; are kept in subjection seven years by the Midianites and Amalekites, 464 and n.; are relieved by Gideon, 404 and n.; the Philistines and Ammonites invade them, 409; are succoured by Jephthah, 409-10 and n.; under succeeding judges they enjoy tranquillity, but relapse into impiety, when God suffers the Philistines again to molest them, 410; Samson relieves them, 411; during his life the administration of affairs in the hands of Eli the high-priest, 433; on Samuel's call to the prophetic office, take arms against the Philistines, and are defeated, 434; Hophni and Phinehas are slain, and the ark taken, 435; the ark is carried by the Philistines into the temple of Dagon, 435 and n.; the idol falls before it, 436 and n.; the Philistines carry back the ark, 437; Samuel succeeds to the government, 437, and n.; they overcome the Philistines again, 437 and n.; Saul is appointed king over them, 439.

Turea, country of, 790, n.

J

Jabal, a descendant of Cain, his inventions, 442.

Jabin, king of Canaan, oppresses the Israelites forty years, 401 and n.

Jabbok, the brook, or river, 195 n.

Jacob, meaning of his name, 179, n.; obtains his father's blessing by stratagem, 181-2 and n.; goes to Laban in Mesopotamia to avoid his brother, 183; his vision, 190; he calls the place there-of Bethel, 190 and n.; his vow, 190 and n.; is received kindly by Laban, 191; demands Rachel as the reward of seven years' service, 191 and n.; arrives at Haran; meets Rachel at the well, 191; is deceived by Laban who gives him Leah instead of Rachel, 192; serves another seven years for Rachel, 192; is angry with her for complaining of her barrenness, 192; at her desire goes in to Bilhah her handmaid, and has by her two sons, Dan and Naphtali, 192; has other two sons, Gad and Ashur, by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, 192; is prevailed upon to remain with Laban, 192; his artifice respecting Laban's cattle, 193 and n.; he departs from Laban with his wives and substance, 193; is pursued by Laban and an altercation ensues, 194; they make a covenant with each other, 194 and n.; Jacob fears to meet Esau; his expedient to soothe his anger, 194-5 and n.; wrestles with an angel, 195; is blessed by him, and receives the name of Israel, 195 and n.; his meeting with Esau, 195; he journeys on to Succoth, 196; from thence to Shechem where he pitches his tent and builds an altar to God, 196; is grieved for Dinah's ravishment, 196; is grieved for the slaughter of the Shechemites, 197; removes to Bethel; causes his people to put away their idols, 197 and n.; and purify themselves, 198; erects an altar at Bethel, 198; departs from this place in a visit to his father; Rachel dies in giving birth to Benjamin; is buried in the way to Ephraim; Jacob is grieved at Reuben's incest, 198; affliction for his son Joseph, 208; his expressions of sorrow, 210 and n.; sends his sons into Egypt to buy corn, 215; his grief on their return, 216; is loth to send Benjamin down to Egypt, 216; yet sends him with his brethren on their second journey thither, 216; his presents to Joseph, 216 and n.; receives Joseph's invitation to come down into Egypt, 218 and n.; he arrives there, 219; number of his family on their arrival in Egypt, 219 n.; is settled by Joseph in the land of Goshen, 219; blesses his sons; prophecies concerning them, 222 and n.; blesses Joseph, 223 and n.; dies and is buried at Macpelah, 223; his body embalmed, 223, n.; encomiums bestowed on his memory, 224, n.

Jaddua the high priest goes to meet Alexander; is favourably received; obtains favourable terms for the Jews, 749 and n.

Jael, wife of Heber, entertains Sisera and kills him, 403 and n.

Jahazah, city of, 769 and n.

Jair, succeeds Tolah, 409; the people fall into all manner of enormities under his government, 409 and n.

James writes his epistle, 1102 and n.; manner of his death, 1102 and n.; his character, 1102 and n.

James the Great, beheaded by order of Agrippa, 1070 and n.

Janus, temple of; shut at Rome, 803.

Japheth, the sons of; their settlements, 121.

Javan, the sons of; their settlements, 121. Jeconiah, see Jehoiachin.

Jehoahaz succeeds Jehu in Israel, 599; his death, 599.

Jehoahaz succeeds Josiah in Judah, 653; dies a prisoner in Egypt, 654 and n.

Jehoash, succeeds Jehoahaz in Israel, 599 and n.; is blessed by Elisha, 604 and n.; defeats the Syrians, 604 and n.; his death 604.

Jehoiachin succeeds Jehoiakim in Judah, 657 and n.; overcome by Nebuchadnezzar and carried captive to Babylon, 657 and n.

Jehoiakin succeeds Jehoahas in Judah, 654 and n.; introduces depravity into his kingdom; is reproved by Jeremiah, 651; is carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, 655; restored to his throne by the conqueror, 655; revolts; is a second time subdued; his death, 655 et seq.

Jehoida conceals Joash in the temple; proclaims him king; dies and is buried in the royal sepulchre, 600 and n.

Jehoram succeeds Jehoshaphat in the throne of Judah, 571; murders his brothers, 571; is threatened by a letter from Elijah, 572 and n.; his death, 572.

Jehoram succeeds Ahaziah in Israel, 573; enters into friendship with Jehoshaphat, 575; they enter into war with the king of Moab, 575 and n.; is slain by Jehu, 595 and n.

Jehoshaphat succeeds Asa in the kingdom

- of Judah, 518; Jehoshaphat puts down idolatry, 559 and n.; is feared and respected by the surrounding nations, 560 and n.; marries his son Jehoram to Athaliah daughter of Ahab king of Israel, 560 and n.; visits Ahab, 569; goes with him to the siege of Ramoth Gilead, 569; is succoured of God and enters into Jerusalem in triumph, 570 and n.; his death, 571.
- Jehoshaphat, valley of, 1012, n.
- Jehovah, remarks on this name of God, 243, n.
- Jehu is anointed king of Israel, 594; slays Jehoram, 595 and n.; and Ahaziah, 596; extirpates Ahab's family, 598 and n.; destroys the worshippers of Baal, 599 and n.; is opposed by Hazael king of Syria, 599; his death, 599.
- Jephthah encounters the Ammonites, 410; his vow, 410 and n.; and death, 410.
- Jeremiah, laments the death of Josiah, 639 and n.; denounces judgments on Jehoiakim, 654; is ill treated, 655; foretells the destruction of Chaldea and Babylon, 658; composes his lamentations, 664 and n.; remains in Jerusalem after the last siege by Nebuchadnezzar, 665; goes with the remnant of his countrymen to Chimham, 681; is taken by them into Egypt, 681, n.; manner of his death, 682, n.
- Jericho, city of, 363 and n.; siege of, 366.
- Jeroboam is elected king by the ten tribes in their revolt from Rehoboam, 542; makes Shechem his royal city, 542; institutes idolatry amongst the people, 542; his arm withers, 543; Abijah his son falls sick, 544; his wife goes to Ahijah to inquire concerning the child, 544 and n.; the child dies, but Jeroboam continues his impieties, 545; is opposed by Ahijah, 546; dies, 549.
- Jeroboam the second, succeeds Jehoash in Israel, 604; is encouraged by Jonah, 605; his death, 605.
- Jerusalem, is taken by Judah and Simeon, and destroyed by fire, 396; ancient city of, and temple described, 523; siege of by Nebuchadnezzar, 662; siege of by Alexander, 748 and n.; by Ptolemy, 750; is besieged by Titus, 1137; who casts a trench about it, 1138; privations and miseries of the inhabitants, 1138; temple burned, 1138; Mount Sion taken, and the whole city exposed to the Roman soldiery, 1138; is razed to the ground, 1138.
- Jezebel, city and valley of, 405, n.
- Jethro, priest of Midian; particulars concerning him, 239, n.
- Jewish doctors, their opinions, 9.
- Jews their ultimate return to Judea, 653, n.; after the murder of Gedaliah retreat to Chimham, and thence pass to Egypt, 618 and n.; they fall into gross idolatry, 682; part of them slain and the rest carried captive to Babylon, 685; their return from Babylon, 691; they solemnize their feasts, 691 and n.; commence the rebuilding of the temple, 692; so called after their return from Babylon, 716, n.; the rich oppress the poor by usury, 730 and n.; their whole nation submit to the dominion of Ptolemy and his successors, 750; are persecuted by Ptolemy Philopater, 753; are persecuted by Antiochus Epiphanes, 756-7; their government originally divine, 764;
- Moses was their instrument of communication with God, 765; seventy elders appointed over them, 765; judges and magistrates of their cities, 765; institution of regal power, 765; establishment of the Sanhedrim, 766; first instituted by the Maccabees, 767; persons composing it, 767; place of assembling, 767; formality of a suit in this council, 768; they are harassed by the Romans, 796; their wars with the Romans under Vespasian and Titus, 1136; are besieged by Titus in Jerusalem, 1137; refuse his offers of mercy and terms of surrender, 1137; destroy the Roman engines, 1137; their distresses and their enormities resulting thence, 1138; their terrible slaughter by the Roman soldiers in the taking of Jerusalem, 1138.
- Jezebel marries Ahab, 560; threatens Elijah, 564 and n.; causes Naboth to be stoned, 568 and n.; her death, 596 and n.
- Joab stabs Abner, 478; kills Absalom, 491.
- Joash, the son of Ahaziah succeeds to the throne of Judah, 600 and n.; at first puts down idolatry, but afterwards sets up idols, &c. 601 and n.; is opposed by Hazael, 601 and n.; is slain by his servants, 602 and n.
- Joash, king of Israel, carries Amaziah captive to Jerusalem, 603; vanquishes Benhadad king of Syria, 604.
- Job, a real personage, 232; descended from Abraham by Keturah, 233 and n.; in what age he lived, 233 and n.; his wealth, 234; his wife, 234, n.; visitations, 234; his friends reprove him, 235; God speaks to him out of the whirlwind, 235; is restored to health and riches, 235; tradition respecting him, 235.
- Job, book of, not merely a dramatic fiction, 233 and n.; opinions concerning, 235 and n.
- Jochebed, wife of Amram, and mother of Moses, 238 and n.
- Joel, the prophet, 608.
- John the baptist, 841 and n.; begins to preach, 851 and n.; particulars of his early life, 852 and n.; his food and raiment, 852 and n.; great numbers are drawn to his preaching, 852; Pharisees and Sadducees come to him; he reproves them, 853 and n.; declares the nature of his mission, 853 and n.; Jesus is baptized of him, 854 and n.; his answer to the message of the Sanhedrim, 855 and n.; bears testimony to the divine mission of Christ, 855; removes to Enon, 859; reproves Herod Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee for his enormities, 859 and n.; is cast into prison at the instigation of Herodias, 859 and n.; is beheaded by Herod at the instigation of Herodias, 914 and n.; his disciples bury him, 915 and n.
- John and Simon, the heads of two opposing factions who wasted Jerusalem, with civil war at the same time that the Romans were besieging the city, 1158 and n.
- John, St. his sufferings, 1112 and n.; his Apocalypse, 1112 and n.; takes charge of the Ephesian church; writes three epistles, 1112 and n.; his labours in the church, 1113; his death 1113; is buried at Ephesus, 1114 and n.
- Jonadab, the son of Rechab, 598 and n.
- Jonah encourages Jeroboam, 605 and n.; is sent to Nineveh, 605; neglects the divine command, and goes towards Tarsus, 605; is cast into the sea, 605 and n.; is swallowed by a great fish, 606; his preservation in the deep, 606; his ground, 606 and n.
- Jonathan, of the Maccabees, succeeds Judas as general of the Jews, 773; defeats Bacchides, and returns to Jerusalem, 773; obtains peace for the Jews, and devotes himself to the reformation of the people, and the restoration of Jerusalem, 774; is made high-priest, 774 and n.; defeats Demetrius, and is rewarded by Alexander, 775 and n.; besieges Jerusalem, 776; murders 100,000 in Antioch to please Demetrius king of Syria, 776; attaches himself to Antiochus the divine, 776; is slain with his two sons, 777; his tomb, 777 and n.
- Jonathan, son of Saul, his friendship for David, 447; his death, 454.
- Joppa, seaport of, 605 and n.
- Jordan, plain of, 145 n.; river of, 363, n.; its waters divide for the passage of Joshua's army, 365.
- Joseph of Arimathea, begs the body of Jesus, 1021 and n.; after embalment, buries it in his own sepulchre, 1022 and n.
- Joseph is favoured by his parents, and envied by his brethren, 208; his dream of the sheaves; his dream of the sun, moon, and eleven stars, 209; his brethren's hatred, 209; is sent to his brethren; finds them in Dothan, 209; they conspire against him, 209; they cast him into a pit, 209; is sold to the Ishmaelites, 209 and n.; by them sold to Potiphar; his brethren deceive Jacob, who supposes him to have been slain, 210; is highly esteemed by Potiphar, 210; his master's wife solicits him; he resists her importunities, 210; is accused by her; is cast into prison, 211 and n.; obtains favour in prison, 212; interprets the dreams of the chief baker and chief butler, 212 and n.; is brought in unto Pharaoh, and interprets his dreams, 213 and n.; his advice to Pharaoh, concerning the years of famine, 214 and n.; is made governor over Egypt, 214; his name is changed by Pharaoh, 214 and n.; he marries the daughter of the priest of On, 214 and n.; his provision for the season of scarcity, 215; his brethren come down into Egypt to buy corn, 215; his treatment of them, 215; gives audience to his brothers on their second coming, 216; they dine with him, 217 and n.; orders his cup to be put into Benjamin's sack, 217; his brethren depart; are overtaken and brought back to answer for Benjamin's theft, 217 and n.; Joseph deals sharply with them, 218; is moved deeply by Reuben's address; discovers himself to his brethren; comforts and assures them, 218; Joseph by Pharaoh's command, sends for Jacob his father, 518; his meeting with his father, 219; presents his family to Pharaoh; settles them in Goshen, 220; his conduct during the famine, 220; performs his father's obsequies with great magnificence, 224 and n.; assures his brethren of continued kindness, 224; has two sons Ephraim and Manasseh, 225; he dies,

- commanding his brethren to carry his body with them into Canaan, 225 and n.
- Joseph's well, 266; hall, granaries, prison, 266-7.
- Joseph is assured by an angel regarding Mary's conception, 844 and n.; takes Mary home to him, 845; he and Mary go to Bethlelem to be taxed, 846 and n.; he returns with the child and his mother to Bethlelem, 848 and n.; an angel informs him of Herod's design against the child's life, 848; departs with his wife and the child into Egypt, 848; returns thence into Galilee, to Nazareth, on the death of Herod, 849 and n.; his death, 851.
- Joseph, nephew of Onias the second, goes to Memphis on an embassy to Ptolemy Euergetes 752; obtains the receiver-generalship of Syria &c., 752; collects the duties, 752.
- Josephus, 1137, 895 et seq.; intreats the Jews to accept the offers of Titus, 1137; his works; is treated with much favour by Vespasian and Titus, 1137 and n.
- Josiah succeeds Amon on the throne of Judah, 637; reforms religion, 637; puts away idolatry, 637; repairs the temple, 638; dies in battle, 639.
- Joshua defeats the Amalekites at Rephadim, 273; appointed successor to Moses, 320 and n.; character of, 361; on the death of Moses takes charge of the Israelites, 363; God assures him of divine help and protection, 363 and n.; sends spies to Jericho, 364; on their return, proceeds to Jericho with 40,000 men, 365; order of his march, 365; encamps before Gilgal, 365; is commanded by God to restore the rite of circumcision, 366 and n.; is instructed by a vision, 366 and n.; besieges Jericho, 366; razes it to the ground, and denounces judgment on any attempting to rebuild it; his forces are repulsed before Ai, 367; God reveals to him the cause thereof, 367 and n.; furnishes Achan, 368; again invests Ai, obtains possession, and destroys the inhabitants, 368 and n.; is deceived by the Gibeonites, and makes peace with them, 369 and n.; assists them against the other princes of Canaan, 369; sun and moon stand still at his command, 370; he executes the confederate kings, 370; takes all the southern parts of Canaan, and returns to Gilgal, 370; defeats Jabin king of Hazor at the waters of Merom, 370 and n.; executes Jabin, and destroys his city, 371; having subdued all Canaan, he divides the land between the tribes, 371; sets up his habitation at Shiloh, 371; dismisses the two tribes and a half, 371 and n.; waxing old, he calls an assembly of the princes and magistrates in Shechem, 372; exhorts them to observe the laws, erects a stone as a testimony; dies, and is buried in mount Ephraim, 373 and n.
- Joshua, son of Josadach, succeeds to the chief priesthood on the return from Babylon, 691.
- Jotham's fable, 407 and n.
- Jotham, son of Uzziah, becomes viceroy of Judah on his father's being smitten with leprosy, 607; is remarkable for his virtues and wise measures, 627 and n.; defeats the Moabites, 627; his death, 627.
- Jubal, a descendant of Cain, his inventions, 44, n.
- Judah marries Shuah, by whom he has three sons Er, Onan, and Sheloh, 211 and n.; his incest with Thamar, 211 and n.; he condemns her for harlotry, 212 and n.
- Judas of Galilee, sect of, its origin &c., 789 and n.
- Judas Iscariot betrays Christ, 1008 and n.; repents, 1011; his death, 1012.
- Judas Maccabeus, son of Mattathias, defeats the deputies of Antiochus, 759; his further victories, 760; restores the temple, 760; continues successful in his wars, 761; defeats the Idumeans and the Ammonites, 769; and Timotheus governor of Judea, 769; defeats the Gentile nations who oppress the Jews, 769, et seq.; defeats Lysias the Syrian, 770; defeats Timotheus, the second of that name, 770; carries the city of Epliron by assault, 771; continues his successes, 771; defeats Antiochus Eupator, 771; defeats Nicanor, 773; makes an alliance with the Romans, 773; is slain in battle against the Syrians, 773.
- Jude, St, writes his epistle, 1109 and n.; is crucified, 1110.
- Judea is reduced to a Roman province, 850.
- Judges appointed by Moses over the Israelites, 274 and n.
- Judith, history of, 659, n.; who wrote it, 660, n.; Judith slays Holofernes, 661 and n.
- Julius Caesar, events in his history, 815.
- Jupiter, statue of, at Olympia, 673 and n.
- K
- Kadesh-Barnea, its situation, 299 and n.
- Karraites, their origin, 786.
- Keilah, city of, 449 and n.
- Kenites, 403 and n.
- Keturah, who she was, 157, n.
- Keys of the kingdom of heaven, 933 and n.
- Kidron, see Cedron, and, 525.
- Kings, apotheosis and worship of, how introduced, 140.
- Kings of Israel, their interment; 629 n.
- Kirjath-Arba, city of, 343.
- Korah, rebels against Moses and Aaron, 301 and n.; he and his company destroyed, 301.
- L
- Laban invites Eliezer into his house, 156; consents that Isaac should have Rebecca to wife, 156; deceives Jacob regarding Rachel, and exculpates himself for so doing, 192 and n.
- Laborosarchod, succeeds Neriglossar in Babylon; his death, 687 and n.
- Ladder, Jacob's, what it was, 206 and n.
- Lamb, the paschal, 267 and n.
- Lamech, 44 and n.; his prophecy 51, n.
- Lamentations of Jeremiah, 664 and n.
- Languages considered, 114.
- Language, remarks concerning, 671, n.
- Language of the Pentateuch, 1.
- Law of Moses imperfectly copied by heathen legislators, 309.
- Law, its ceremonies typical of the Christian dispensation, 312.
- Lawgiver, its signification, 225.
- Last supper, 1005 and n.
- Lazar, its signification, 961, n.
- Lazarus raised from the dead, 969 and n.
- Leah, her person described, 191; is given Jacob instead of Rachel, 192, and n.; is fruitful, 192; brings forth Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulon and Dinah, 192.
- Leaven of the Pharisees, 918 and n.
- Lebanon, mountains of, 346; vineyards of 349; cedars of, 350.
- Lentils, 179, n.
- Leprosy, its nature described, 299, n.
- Let there be light, the sublimity of this fiat, 4, n.
- Letters, the knowledge of, how conveyed from one nation to another, 135-6; the nature and origin of letters considered, 136; invention of, 276, n.
- Levi, tribe of, called to the service of the tabernacle, 297.
- Levites destroy the idolaters by command of Moses, 277 and n.
- Library of Alexandria, 751, and n.
- Libya, country of, 1016, n.
- Lice, the plague of, 245 and n.
- Light, how admitted into the ark, 81-82
- Linus suffers martyrdom, 1109 and n.
- Locusts, the plague of, 246 and n.; the eating of, 252 and n.
- Longevity of the Antediluvians, 69.
- Lot separates from Abram, and dwells in the plains of Sodom and Gomorrah, 145; plundered after the battle of the kings at Siddim, 146; entertains two angels at Sodom, 149 and n.; conduct of the men of Sodom; Lot exculpates; the angels divulge their mission; Lot, his wife and family retreat to Zoar to escape the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; his wife looks backward and is changed into a pillar of salt, 150 and n.; Lot withdraws to the mountains; his daughters deceive him; the birth of Moab and Ammon, 151 and n.; his probable eminence in Sodom, 165; his conduct in exposing his daughters defended, 165; the incest of his daughters not without palliation, 166.
- Lot's wife, her metamorphosis, speculations concerning 174-5 and n.
- Lots, the feast of, 726 and n.
- Lucius, one of the seventy, 1071 and n.
- Luke the evangelist, his life and writings, 891 and n.; joins St Paul in his travels, 1087.
- Lycia, province of, 1096 and n.
- Lydda, town of, 1067, n.
- Lysias, the Syrian general, marches against Judas Maccabeus with a strong power, 778; is defeated by Judas, 770.
- Lystra, sacrifice there offered to Paul and Barnabas, 1073 and n.
- M
- Maccabees, the, 759, n.
- Macedonia, province of, 1076, n.
- Macherus, castle of, 914 and n.
- Maepelah, cave of, 155, n.
- Magie, the several kinds of, 255 and n. 683; the Egyptians famous for their skill in, 261.
- Magian, the, 716 and n.; see also Artaxerxes.
- Magicians of Egypt, 214, 255.
- Mahanaim, 477 and n.; its situation, 194, n.
- Makkedah, city of, 370 and n.
- Malachi, the prophet, 734 and n.

- Malta, isle of, 1098, n.
 Mamre, plain, or oak of, 145, n.
 Man created, 6 and n.; his admirable formation and endowments, 14; created a free agent, 32.
 Manaen, one of the seventy, 1071 and n.
 Manasseh succeeds Hezekiah in the kingdom of Judah, 636; restores idolatry, contemns the prophets, 636 and n.; is vanquished by Esarhaddon, and carried prisoner to Babylon, 636 and n.; is restored to his kingdom, 636; reforms religion; dies, 637 and n.
 Manasseh unites himself with Sanballat, and by favour of the king of Persia, erects a temple on mount Gerizzim near Samaria, 746; is made high-priest thereof, 746 and n.
 Manetho, the historian, 61, 62.
 Mandrakes, description of, 203 and n.
 Mankind, the general corruption of, 52.
 Mamma, the fall of, 272 and n.
 Mancoah is promised a son by an angel, 411; Samson is born to him, 411.
 Mantle, Elijah's, 565, n.
 Marah, waters of, 271 and n.
 Mariamme, wife of Herod, 797, n.
 Mark the evangelist, his life and writings, 889 and n.
 Marriage ceremonies of the east, 882 et seq.
 Marriage feast, 411 and n.
 Mary, the angel Gabriel announces to her the miraculous conception, 843 and n.; visits Elizabeth, 844 and n.; returns to Nazareth, 844; is delivered of a son at Bethlehem, 846 and n.
 Mary Magdalene, 1023 and n.
 Mattaniah; see Zedekiah.
 Mattathias opposes the edict of Antiochus, 758; destroys the groves and idols he had made, 758; returns to the mountains, 758; dies, requiring his sons to resist Antiochus, 758.
 Matter, did it exist previous to the Mosaic creation, 3, n.
 Matthew, the evangelist; his life and writings, 887 and n.
 Matthias is chosen one of the twelve in place of Judas, 1058.
 Matthias, St, his labours and martyrdom, 1111 and n.
 Megiddo, its situation, 659, n.
 Melchizedek, king of Salem, blesses Abram, 146; difficulties in his character, 166; why called king of Salem, 167; who he was, 167-8 and n.
 Melita, isle of, 1098, n.
 Memphis, city of, built by Mizraim, 134 and 752.
 Menahem seizes on the throne of Israel, 623; his enormities, 623 and n.; bribes the king of Assyria, 623 and n.; dies, 623.
 Menander, Ebion, and Cerinthus, founders of heresies, 1109 and n.
 Menelaus obtains the chief priesthood, 755.
 Menes, a descendant of Ham, settles in Egypt, builds Thebes, 131.
 Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, 517.
 Meribah, the rock of, 273, n.
 Messiah, signification of the word, 811, n.
 Messiah, first promise of the, 27.
 Micah of mount Ephraim, his idolatry &c., 398.
 Michaelmas Flaws, storms so called, 1097, n.
 Michal, daughter of Saul, marries David, 415.
 Midian, son of Abraham by Keturah, 157.
 Midianites, their slaughter; their virgins only saved, 319.
 Midwives, the Egyptian, 237 and n.
 Miletus, town of, 1087, n.
 Miracles, remarks upon, 255; concerning, 985 et seq.
 Miracles of Christ, their excellency, &c., 980 et seq.; character of a true miracle, 980; Jewish evasion of the miracles, 981; the occasional performance of a miracle by others, not derogatory to the glory of Christ, 984.
 Miraculous powers ascribed to heathen demigods and heroes, 937.
 Miriam, sister of Moses and Aaron, 238; her song of deliverance, 271 and n.; smitten with leprosy, 299 and n.; dies; is buried with great pomp; and lamented by the people, 314 and n.
 Mithridates, passages in his history; his death, 812 et seq.
 Mitre, the, 311.
 Mitylene, city of, 1087, n.
 Mizpeh, city of, 437, n.
 Mizraim, second son of Ham, king of Egypt, 122; kingdom divided between his three sons, 122; named Menes, by heathen writers, 134, n.; builds Zoar, 131; Thebes, 134; and Memphis, 134; sons of, become king of Egypt; their character, 135 and n.
 Moab and Ammon, their incestuous origin; their settlements, 151 and n.
 Moloch, the idol, 304; form of worshipping, 304, n.; passing through the fire to, 627, n.
 Money, what it was in early times, 196, n.
 Money changers, 994, n.
 Monuments, Egyptian, 262.
 Moon created, 5.
 Moral evil, ancient opinions concerning, 37.
 Mordecai, uncle of Esther, 720 and n.; discovers a conspiracy against Ahasuerus, 721 and n.; refuses reverence to Haman, 721 and n.; bemoans the king's decree against the Jews, 722 and n.; is advanced to honour, 724 and n.; made keeper of the signet to Ahasuerus, 725.
 Moriah, mount of, 154, n.
 Mosaic history, its extent defined, 1 and n.
 Moses' description of the creation contrasted with other accounts, 11.
 Moses, tradition respecting him, 237, n.
 Moses born; is exposed on the Nile; is preserved by Pharaoh's daughter, 238 and n.; is greatly beloved by her, 238 and n.; his forward understanding, 238, n.; etymology of his name, 238, n.; his education, 238, n.; incidents of his early life, 239 and n.; he slays an Egyptian for abusing a Hebrew, 239; and retreats into the country of Midian, 239; meets with the daughters of Jethro, 239; is invited by Jethro, 239; supposition as to his being the author of the book of Job, 239, n.; becomes shepherd to Jethro, 240; receives Zipporah, Jethro's daughter, in marriage, 240; has by her two sons, Gershom and Eliezer, 240; God appears to him out of the bush, 240 and n.; commands him to put off his shoes, 240 and n.; is commanded by God to undertake the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, 241; God assures him and promises him divine assistance, 241; receives from God a power of working miracles, 241 and n.; Moses wishes to excuse himself for his slowness of speech, 241 and n.; Aaron is associated with him to act as orator, 242; Moses' rod, 242 and n.; Moses takes leave of Jethro and departs to Egypt, 242 and n.; his child circumcised, 242 and n.; meets Aaron, and they, together, in presence of the elders of the Israelites, give miraculous tokens of their Divine mission, 242; Moses and Aaron have audience of Pharaoh, and request permission for the Israelites to journey to the wilderness and do sacrifice to God, 242; Pharaoh refuses, 243 and n.; and inflicts severe tasks on the people, 243; Moses and Aaron are upbraided by the Israelites as the cause of their increased burdens, 243; Moses is directed by God to assure the Israelites of his favour and redemption from bondage, 244; Moses and Aaron are sent by God again unto Pharaoh, and do miracles in his presence, 244; Aaron's rod changed into a serpent, 244; magicians imitate the miracle, 244; Moses and Aaron importune Pharaoh yet more to let the people go, 245; they turn the waters of Egypt into blood, 245; magicians imitate this miracle, 245; Moses and Aaron, on Pharaoh's further refusal of their suit, bring upon Egypt the plague of frogs, 245 and n.; magicians imitate the miracle, 245; Moses and Aaron, by God's command, bring upon Egypt the plague of lice, 245 and n.; the murrain of the cattle, 245; the plague of flies, 245 and n.; of boils, 245 and n.; of hail, 246 and n.; Moses and Aaron bring the plague of locusts, 246 and n.; of darkness, 246 and n.; Pharaoh relents, but afterwards refuses to let the people go, and commands Moses to see his face no more, 247; Moses acquaints Pharaoh of the intended plague, the death of the first-born, 247; Pharaoh expels him from his presence, 247; the death of the first-born, 247-8; institution of the Passover, 247; the Egyptians hasten the departure of the Israelites, 248; Moses leads the Israelites to Rameses, and thence to Succoth, 269; they take with them the bones of their ancestors, 269, n.; God commands the dedication of the first-born, 269; the Israelites journey along the shores of the Red sea, 269; the pillar of cloud and flame, 269; Israelites arrive at Etham, 269; Pharaoh and his host come up with them at Pihahiroth, 270; Moses, at God's command, divides the Red sea, 270; Pharaoh and his host overwhelmed therein, 270; Israelites arrive in the wilderness of Shur, 271; Moses sweetens the waters of Marah, 271; strikes the rock Horeb and the waters flow out, 272 and n.; commands Joshua to give battle to the Amalekites, 273; his hands held up by Aaron and Hur, whilst Joshua is fighting with the Amalekites, 273; is visited by Jethro, 273 and n.; by advice of Jethro appoints rulers over the people, 274; is called up of God to mount Sinai, 274; ascends a second time, 274; the tables of the moral law committed to him, 275; is besought of the people to speak to God in their stead, 275; erects an altar, 275; sacrifices, and raises twelve pillars as monuments of

- God's covenant, 275 and n.; Moses passes forty days in the mount of Sinai, 275; God instructs him in all things connected with the tabernacle, commands the observance of the sabbath, 275; and delivers the written tables of the law, 276; intercedes with God to pardon the idolatry of the Israelites, 277; he breaks the tables of the law on beholding their idolatry, 277; causes the idol to be reduced to powder, and obliges the people to mingle it with their drink, 277 and n.; commands the tribe of Levi to slay the leaders in this idolatrous worship, 277 and n.; Moses reproves the people; intercedes with God for them; and receives two other tables containing the moral law, 277; his face made glorious by converse with God, 297; commands the people to make offerings for the building of the tabernacle, 297; receives instructions from God respecting the manner of worshipping, 297; the renewal of the passover, 298 and n.; the numbering of the tribes, 298 and n.; their encampment, 298; receives intimation to leave mount Sinai, 298 and n.; institutes the court of seventy elders, 299 and n.; chooses twelve men from each tribe to examine and report upon the land of Canaan, 299; his conduct in the matter of Korah, 301; composes the nineteenth psalm, 313 and n.; not permitted to enter Canaan, 314; sets up the brazen serpent, 315; punishes the Israelites for their whoredoms with the Moabites, 318; destroys the Moabites, 319; their women and children, 319 and n.; divides the country between the tribes, 320 and n.; feels the approach of death; counsels the Israelites and blesses them, 321; dies on mount Pisgah, 322 and n.; is buried near Beth-Peor, 322; his character, 322, n.
- Mourning, ancient rites of, 155, n.
- Murder of Abel, 41, 43 and n.; period of, 45; tradition respecting the, 47, n.
- Murrain of the cattle of Egypt, 245.
- Muscles of the human body, 14.
- Mysia, province of, 1076, n.
- Mythological allusion to Noah's intoxication and exposure, 101, n.
- N
- Naamah, inventress of spinning and weaving 44.
- Naaman, his leprosy cured by Elisha, 577.
- Nabal, his history and death, 451 and n.
- Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, 654.
- Naboth, his vineyard, 568; is stoned, 568, and n.
- Nabuchodonosor, 660 and n.
- Nadab succeeds Jeroboam in Israel, 549; is slain by Baasha, 549.
- Nadab and Abihu, destroyed by lightning, 297.
- Nahum the prophet, 454, n.
- Nain or Naim, town of, 905 and n.
- Names, religion of, 148, n.
- Naomi, wife of Elimelech, 403.
- Naphtahim, son of Mizraim, king of middle Egypt, 122.
- Nathan reproves David, 484.
- Nazarenes, Christians so called, 1092 and n.
- Nazareth, its situation, 842, n.
- Nazarite, what the meaning of the term, 411, n., and 1089.
- Neapolis, port of, 1076, n.
- Nebuchadnezzar subdues Syria and Palestine, takes the city of Jerusalem, and carries Jehoiakim captive to Babylon, 655; invades Judah a second time, carries the inhabitants captive to Babylon; his third conquest of Jerusalem, 657; appoints Mattaniah his deputy, naming him Zedekiah, 658; finally besieges Jerusalem, 662; and causes Zedekiah's eyes to be put out, his sons slain and he himself carried in fetters to Babylon, 664; razes the city of Jerusalem; carries the remainder of the people captive, and removes to Babylon all the treasures and sacred vessels of the temple, 664 and n.; appoints Gedaliah governor in Jerusalem, 665; Daniel interprets his dream, 683 and n.; erects the golden statue, 684 and n.; commands Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego to be cast into the furnace for refusing to worship it, 684 and n.; his second dream, 685 and n.; his insanity, 686; his senses restored, and he acknowledges the sovereignty of God, 686 and n.
- Neeromancy, 471 and n.
- Nehemiah succeeds Ezra in the government of Judah and Jerusalem, 728 and n.; obtains permission from Ahasuerus to rebuild the walls and gates of Jerusalem, 728 and n.; meets with opposition in his work from Sanballat and Tobiah, 729 and n.; dedicates the walls and gates, 730 and n.; gives the gates in charge to Hanani and Hananiah, 730 and n.; obliges a tenth part of the people of Judah and Benjamin to dwell at Jerusalem, 730 and n.; compels the usurers to refund, 731 and n.; his hospitality and generosity, 731 and n.; returns to Shushan, 731; returns from Persia and finds the temple profaned, 732 and n.; reforms abuses, 733 and n.; dissolves unlawful marriages, 733 and n.; his death, 734.
- Nergal, 624 and n.
- Neriglissar succeeds Evilmerodach in Babylon, 686; is slain in battle by the Medes and Persians, 687.
- Nero casts Paul and Peter into prison; raises the first general persecution of the Christians, 1104; acknowledged successor of Claudius by the soldiery, 1133; his moderation in the commencement of his reign, 1133; poisons Germanicus; divorces his wife Octavia and takes Sabina to his bed; murders his mother Agrippina, and gives himself up to all manner of vices and extravagances, 1133; puts Lucretia and Seneca to death, 1133; sets fire to Rome; lays the crime on the Christians and causes a general persecution of them, 1132; his enormities cause a revolt; his death, 1131.
- Nerva succeeds Domitian in the Roman empire, 1142; succours the Christians and governs with clemency, 1142; adopts Trajan as his successor, 1142; his death, 1142.
- Nihlaz, and Tartak, 625 and n.
- Nicanor, made general against the Jews, 772; his death, 773.
- Nicodemus, 858; visits Christ by night; is instructed by him, 858 and n.; becomes a convert, 859.
- Nicolaitans, 1109 and n.
- Nicopolis, town of, 1106, n.
- Nile, the river, where situated: its extent; overflowing of; divine honours paid to it, 245, n.
- Nimrod, question whether he erected the tower of Babel; his kingdom, 117; was a great hunter, 118; the first fire-worksman; the first man who made invasion upon the territories of others, 132.
- Nineveh, city of, built by Ashur, 133; or by Nimrod, 133, n.; description of, 134; destroyed by Nabopolassar, 134; is warned by Jonah, 606 and n.
- Ninus, second king of Assyria; subdues Babylonia; obtains Semiramis wife of Memnon; has a son by her; his reign and death, 134; opinion concerning Ninus, 134, n.
- Ninyas, king of Assyria, 134; reigns jointly with Semiramis; the latter removes her court to Babylon; makes an unsuccessful attempt to subdue India; resigns the crown to Ninyas; dies, 135; reign of Ninyas and his character, 135.
- Niobe, fable of, 451, n.
- Noah born, 54; preaches repentance, 55 and n.; lived a great while after the confusion of Babel, 94; offers burnt sacrifices on leaving the ark, 95; God's covenant with him, 95 and n.; supposed to have settled in China after the flood, 95, 101; becomes a husbandman, 96 and n.; drinks wine and is intoxicated; the conduct of his sons; he blesses Shem, and Japhet, and curses Ham, 96 and n.; the privileges and blessings bestowed on him and his descendants, 96 and n.; death and burial of, 97; difficulties and objections regarding his history explained and answered, 97; his sacrifices considered, 97 and n.; probably was not inebriated, his blessing and cursing of his sons were prophetic, 103; distribution of the world to his sons, 121, n.; the sons of, 121; their settlements, 121, n.; they fall into idolatry and polytheism, 123.
- Nob, city of, 448 and n.
- Nod, land of, 44-46.
- Nurses, ancient; how esteemed, 157, n.
- O
- Oak of Moreh, 143 and n.
- Oaths, veneration for them among the heathens, 580.
- Obadiah, the prophet, 608.
- Obadiah, 561 and n.; conceals the prophets from Jezebel, 562; meets Elijah, 562.
- Objection to the Mosaic account of the creation, 8.
- Objections and difficulties respecting the corruption of mankind answered and explained, 55; the history of the deluge, 73; regarding the history of Abraham, 158 to 165; the history of Lot, 165-6; the character of Melchisedec, 166-8; Ishmael and the prophecy concerning him, 169; circumcision, 171 and n.; the offering of Isaac, 173 and n.; Lot's wife, 174-5 and n.; the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, 176-8 and n.; regarding the life and character of Isaac, 183 et seq.; Esau selling his birthright, 184; Jacob's interception of the blessing, 184-5 and n.; his straitened circumstances when he went to Laban,

185; Jacob's longing for venison, 186; the contest about the wells, 186; the simplicity of the patriarchal life, 186; Isaac's blessing to Jacob, 187 et seq.; respecting the life of Jacob from his going into Mesopotamia, to his return, 189 et seq.; Jacob's appropriation of Laban's flocks, 198; his vow, 199; his putting away the idols 200; his interview with Esau, 200; his polygamy, 201; his wrestling with the angel, 201; his conduct in the matter of the Shechemites, 202; respecting Laban's gods, 203; Rachel's conduct in perloining them, 203; Rachel's desire for the mandrakes, 204; respecting the giving of handmaids, 204; Jacob's ladder and pillar, 205; the history of Joseph and the latter parts of Jacob's life, 225 et seq.; the departure of the sceptre from Judah, 225; Jacob's bequest to Joseph, 227; his prophecies regarding his sons, 227; why Potiphar did not put Joseph to death, 228; wherefore Joseph married the daughter of the priest of On, 228; respecting Joseph's mode of juramentation, 229; his divination, 229; his treatment of his brethren, 229; his advice to Pharaoh and conduct during the famine, 231; his conduct therein vindicated, 231, n.; respecting the life of Moses and the Exodus of the Israelites, 248 et seq.; the sufferings of the Israelites in Egypt, 248; God's choosing the Israelites, 249; Moses' history and his conduct, 249; God's communication with him, 250; his unwillingness to undertake the delivery of the Israelites, 251; the circumcision of his son, 252; his request to Pharaoh for the Israelites, 253; God's hardening Pharaoh's heart, 254; the Israelites spoiling the Egyptians, 254; the miracles performed by Moses, 255; the imitations by the magicians, 256 and n.; respecting the pillar of fire and cloud, 278; why God conducted the Israelites by way of the wilderness into Canaan, 279; the presence of God on mount Sinai, 279; Moses' intercourse with God, 280; cities of refuge, 280; law of retaliation, 280 and n.; Jewish laws and ceremonials, 280-1 and n.; Urim and Thummim, 281 and n.; relating to the ark of the covenant, 281; the cherubim thereon, 281 and n.; the use of bells, 281, n.; language applied to the deity, 282 and n.; Moses' deprecation of God's judgments, 282; impartiality of Moses' history, 285; the golden calf, 283 and n.; Aaron's conduct in the matter of the golden calf, 283-4; respecting the passage of the Red sea, 285; not to be accounted for by natural causes, 285; not similar to Alexander's passage over the sea of Pamphylia, 286; why Moses took the rout of the Red sea, 287; tides of the Red sea, 287; respecting Moses' fast on the mount, 302; the horns of Moses, 303; the rebellion of the Israelites, 304; their idolatry, 304; their desire for animal food, 304; meats allowed and forbidden, 305; the offering strange fire, 306; the guilt of Nadab and Abihu, 307 and n.; the quarrel between Moses, Aaron and Miriam, 307; the rod of Aaron, 308; Korah's rebellion, 309; respecting the account given in the Pentateuch of the death of Moses, 322; who wrote that account, 323; respecting Moses' prohibition to enter the promised land, 323; the death of Zimri, 324; the garments and shoes of the Israelites, 325; Baalam's character, 326 and n.; his conduct, 327; his prophecy, 327 and n.; his journey to meet Balak, 329; his ass speaking, 329; human language as applied to God, 330; the slaughter of the Canaanites, 330; and their children, 331; jealousy of the Jewish people, 331; the serpents in the wilderness, 332 and n.; the brazen serpent, 332 and n.; respecting the history of the Israelites from the entrance into Canaan to the death of Joshua, 373; character and conduct of Rahab, 374; the destruction of Jericho, 375; the dividing of the Jordan, 376; the renewal of circumcision, 376; Joshua's vision, 377; Jewish observance of the sabbath, 377; the destruction of the walls of Jericho, 377; the Urim and Thummim, 378; the Gibeonites and the Israelites' conduct towards them, 379; why the Israelites were always victorious, 381; the punishment of Achan, 382; respecting the shower of stones, and Joshua's commanding the sun and moon to stand still, 385; of the credibility of the Old Testament, 391; the destruction of the Canaanites, 391; respecting the character of the judges in Israel, 415; Deborah's commendation of Jael, 416; Barak's expedition against Sisera, 417; Gideon and his conduct, 418; Samson's slaying 1000 Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, 420; his destroying the corn by means of foxes, 421-422 and n.; Samson's hair, 423; his destroying the temple of Dagon, 423 and n.; the wars of the Benjamites, 425; the rape of the virgins of Shiloh, 425 and n.; Jephthah's vow, 428 et seq.; respecting the taking of the ark and the fall of Dagon, 455; the Israelites demanding a king, 457; the election of Saul as king, 457; Samuel's cutting Agag in pieces, 460; the music of the Hebrews, 461; David's conduct, 462; his sparing Saul's life, 465; his conduct towards Nabal, 466; the manner of Saul's death, 466; respecting Saul and the witch of Endor, 472; the nature of the apparition, 472; character of the witch, 473; respecting the character of David, 492; respecting the slaughter of the Gibeonites, 514; David's numbering the people, 518; the appointment of Solomon as successor to David, 520; Solomon's character and conduct, 521; respecting the idolatry of Jeroboam and Rehoboam, 550; the queen of Sheba, 552; her visit to Solomon, 553; Solomon's wives and concubines, 553; his idolatry, 554; respecting the cure of Naaman's leprosy, 578; Elisha's being mocked of the children, and their destruction, 579 and n.; the destruction of the captains and their companies, 579; Elijah's conduct, 580 and n.; his abstinence, 581; his being fed by ravens, 582 and n.; his destroying the worshippers of Baal, 583; Ahab's repentance, 583; Hiel's punishment, 583; and n.; Jehoshaphat's reformation, 585; the falling of the walls of Alick, 586 and n.; respecting the translation of Enoch and Elijah, 586; respecting the prophecy relating to Nineveh, 600; Jonah's preservation in the deep, 600; Elisha's smiting the Syrians with blindness, 610; Hazael's being anointed king of Syria, 610; the conduct of Jehu, 613; the differences which occur in scripture history, 614; the destruction of the worshippers of Baal, 615; Jonah's mission to Nineveh, and abode in the whale's belly, 615 et seq.; respecting the cure of Tobit's blindness, 640; Raphael's companionship with Tobit and his instructions to him, 640; respecting demons, 640; the book of Tobit, 641 n.; the renewal of the passover, 642; the proneness of the Israelites to fall into idolatry, 642, n.; Josiah's putting down idolatry, 643; his war with the king of Egypt, 644; his death, 644; Isaiah's message to Hezekiah, 644; the dial of Ahaz, 645; instruments to measure time, 645; the sun's going back thereon, 646 et seq.; of the transportation of the ten tribes and their return, 648 et seq.; respecting the book of Judith, 665; Holofernes, 667 and n.; Judith's slaying of Holofernes, 667; God's commands to Jeremiah, 669; several statements in his prophecies, 669; Hosea's marriage 670; Ezekiel's flight, 670; Isaiah's walking naked three years, 671; respecting Daniel and his character, 694; book of Daniel, 695; his education, 695; the magicians, astrologers, and wise men of Babylon, 696; Daniel's dreams and visions, 696; veracity of his writings, 697; why his name and writings have occasionally been passed over in silence, 698; the mystical character of his writings, 699; his vision of the seventy weeks, 701; Ezekiel's chariot, 702-3 and n.; his prophecy of Gog and Magog, 703 and n.; respecting the differences in the number that returned from Babylon, 705; the second temple, 706 and n.; respecting Babylon, its siege and overthrow, 707; its remains hodie, 710; the pride and punishment of Nebuchadnezzar, 711; his metamorphosis, 714; respecting the Jewish laws regarding marriage, 735; Nehemiah's rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, 735; the book of Nehemiah, 736; the character of Ezra, 736; the book of Ezra, 737; concerning Sanballat, 737; the book of Esther, 738; Mordecai's refusing reverence to Haman, 738; Esther's marriage with Ahasuerus, 738; Haman's intrigues against Mordecai and the Jews, 739; Ezra's edition of the holy scriptures, and the institutions of synagogue worship, 740 et seq.; the origin of synagogues, 742 and n.; the services therein, 743 and n.; officers, 745; times of assembling therein, 745; respecting the character of Antiochus Epiphanes, 762; his sacrilege at Elymais, 762; the victories of Judas Maccabeus, 763; the apparitions in the air, 763; matters concerning the ark, 763; the destruction of the Jews at Alexandria, 764; of the elephants used on that occasion, 764; the angels leading the Jewish army, 764; respecting the books of the Macabees, 780; the character of Judas Maccabeus, 782; his conduct, 782; the strength of the elephant, 783 and n.; Eleazar's killing the royal elephants, 783; the suicide of Razis, 783; the destruction of Samaria by Hyrcanus 784; the apostacy

- of Hyrcanus, 784; the history of Josephus, 804; the conduct of Alexander the Great to the Jews, 804; the Septuagint version, 805; the rewards conferred on the translators, 806; respecting the veracity of the evangelists, 807; Christ's descent according to the flesh, 868; John the Baptist's denial that he was the Elias, 869; the taxation of Judea, &c., 870; the immaculate conception, 871; why Christ was born of a virgin, 872; the office and character of the Messiah, 872; the descent of the Holy Ghost on the Saviour, 873; Christ's temptations, 873 and n.; his miracles, 875; persons possessed of devils, 875; the marriage at Cana, 876 et seq. and n.; why Christ is called Immanuel, 878 and n.; the wise men, 880; the star which conducted them, 880; the murder of the children at Bethlehem, 881; respecting a seeming inconsistency in our Saviour's character, 881; respecting St John's Gospel, 922; the silence of Josephus respecting the sanative qualities of the waters of Bethesda, 923; whence that sanative quality was derived, 923; the cures performed by its waters, 924 and n.; the widow of Nain's son, and his restoration, 925; the cure of the ruler of Capernaum's daughter, 925; the devils entering into the herd of swine, 925; Christ's transfiguration, 926; the conduct of the Baptist regarding Christ, 928 and n.; Christ's discoursing in parables, 928 and n.; respecting the Pharisees' demanding a sign from heaven, 930; Christ's answer to them, 931; the character and qualifications of our Saviour's disciples, 931; their gifts &c., 931-2; St Mark's representing Christ as a person beside himself, 932; Christ's injunctions and promise to Peter, 933; the sin against the Holy Ghost, 934; respecting the command to eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man, 935 and n.; Peter's exclamation thereupon, 936; respecting Christ's entry into Jerusalem, 972; the writings of the evangelists, 974; the raising of Lazarus, 974 and n.; the restoring sight to the blind, 976; the woman taken in adultery, 976; the Socinian opinions, 977; the parable of the hundred sheep, 978; the lord of the vineyard, 978; respecting the Acts of the Apostles, &c., 1114 et seq.; St Paul and his conduct, &c., 1119 et seq.; St Peter and his conduct, &c., 1122 et seq.; respecting the term Son of man, 1028; Christ's conduct regarding his titles, 1028; Christ's nature, 1029; his knowledge, 1029; his human feelings, 1030; his agonies, 1031; plan of redemption, 1032; Christ's sufferings, 1033; Judas Iscariot, and his behaviour, 1034; Peter's denial of Christ, 1035; the penitent thief, 1035; an apparent mistake by St Matthew, 1036; the supernatural darkness at the crucifixion, 1037; other appearances at that time, 1038; the barren fig-tree, 1039; Christ's rebukes to the Scribes and Pharisees, 1040; his predictions respecting Jerusalem, 1041; concerning baptism, 1042; the last supper, 1043; the resurrection of Christ, 1044; the incredulity of Thomas, 1045 and n.
- Oblations first offered, 42 and n.
- Ocean, its wonders considered, 14.
- Ochus succeeded Artaxerxes the second in Persia, 748 and n.; is poisoned by Bagoas, 748 and n.
- Octavianus; see Augustus Caesar.
- Offerings of Cain and Abel considered, 51.
- Og, king of Bashan, 315 and n.
- Olives, mount of, 352, 971, n.
- Olympiads, 674, n.
- Olympic games instituted in Greece, 673.
- Omri is chosen king of Israel, 549; his people revolt, and part declare for Tibni, 549.
- Onan's wickedness and death, 211 and n.
- Onesimus, a convert of St Paul, 1100 and n.
- Onias the high priest dies; is succeeded by Simon, 750.
- Onias, son of Simon the Just, succeeds Eleazar in the priesthood, 751; neglects the tribute to the king of Egypt, 751.
- Ophir, land of, its situation, 556, n.
- Oreb and Zeeb, slain by the Israelites, 406.
- Origen, his opinion concerning the image of God, 21.
- Original sin, 38.
- Orpah, 403.
- Othniel, first of the judges, 397.
- Otho becomes emperor of Rome on the death of Galba, 1135; is opposed by Vitellius, 1135; kills himself, 1136 and n.
- Ovid, the poet, banished by Augustus Caesar; see Augustus Caesar.

P

- Painting the eyes, custom of; see Jezebel.
- Pamphylia, province of, 1072, n.
- Pandataria, island of; see Augustus Caesar.
- Pantheon, the Egyptian, 265 and n.
- Paphos, city of, 1072 and n.
- Palatine, its general fertility, 355; surrounded by deserts, 359; and wildernesses, 359.
- Parables, much in use with oriental sages and writers, 928 and n.
- Paradise, 15 and n.; its situation, 16 and n.; 1018, n.
- Passover, its institution: ceremonies connected therewith, 247 and n.
- Patara, sea-port of, 1088, n.
- Patmos, island of; see John, St.
- Patras, city of, 1105, n.
- Pa'thrusim, son of Misraim, 122.
- Paul enters into an explanation with the Jewish consistory, 1099 and n.; dwells for two years in his hired house at Rome, and makes many converts, 1100; converts Onesimus and writes an epistle on his behalf, to Philemon, 1100; receives contributions from the Philippians to whom he returns an epistle by Epaphroditus, 1100 and n.; sends his epistle to the Ephesians by Tychicus, 1101 and n.; writes his epistle to the Colossians, 1101 and n.; he is discharged from custody, 1103; writes his epistle to the Hebrews, 1103 and n.; in company with Timothy proceeds to Spain, whence probably he came to Britain, 1103 and n.; afterwards proceeds to Crete, and appoints Titus bishop; then visits Judea, 1103.
- Paul and Barnabas proceed to Perga; thence to Antioch in Pisidia, 1072 and n.; Paul preaches in the synagogue, 1072; by the malice of the Jews they are compelled to depart to Iconium and thence to Lystra, 1072 and n.; Paul heals a lame man at Lystra, 1073 and n.; the priest of Jupiter proposes to sacrifice to Paul and Barnabas, 1073 and n.; they prevent him, 1073; Paul is stoned, 1073; he and Barnabas at length return to Antioch in Syria, 1073; obtain from the church at Antioch a remission of the rite of circumcision, 1074 and n.; Paul and Barnabas part, 1075 and n.
- Paul and Silas travelling through Syria and Cilicia, come at length to Crete, 1075 and n.; constitute Titus bishop of Crete, 1075; associate Timothy with them, 1075 and n.; they pass through Phrygia and Galatia; St Luke joins them in Macedonia, 1076, n.; Paul converts Lydia at Philippi, 1076 and n.; they cast the spirit of divination out of the damsel at Philippi, 1077, and n.; they are scourged and cast into prison; the doors thrown open by an earthquake; conversion of the jailor and his family, 1077 and n.; are prayed to leave Philippi, 1078 and n.; they come to Thessalonica, 1078 and n.; Paul preaches in the synagogues three sabbath days, 1078; they are conveyed by the brethren to Berea, 1078 and n.; Paul departs to Athens, 1078 and n.; brought before the Areopagus, 1079 and n.; endeavours to convince the Athenians of the folly of their idolatry, 1079 and n.; converts Dionysius and Damaris, 1080 and n.; departs to Corinth, 1080 and n.; converts Aquila and Priscilla; lodges with them; teaches in the synagogues every sabbath day, 1080 and n.; writes his first epistle to the Thessalonians, 1080; he converts numbers of the Gentiles, 1081 and n.; is brought before Gallio, 1081 and n.; writes his second epistle to the Thessalonians, 1081; proceeds to Ephesus, 1081 and n.; thence to Jerusalem to the passover, 1082; afterwards returns to Ephesus, 1082; by the imposition of hands bestows on the disciples at Ephesus the gift of the Holy Ghost, 1082; the magicians bring their books to him and burn them, 1083 and n.; returns into Macedonia and Achaia; winters in Corinth; and passes thence to Jerusalem to the feast of Pentecost, 1083; his first epistle to the Corinthians, 1084 and n.; his epistle to the Galatians, 1084 and n.; is opposed by Demetrius at Ephesus, 1084 and n.; while at Corinth writes his epistle to the Romans, 1086 and n.; celebrates the passover at Philippi, 1086; proceeds to Troas; restores Eutychus to life, 1086; he writes his second epistle to the Corinthians, 1086; comes to Miletus and there meets the bishops, &c. of the Ephesian church, 1087; arrives at Tyre; thence sails to Ptolemais, 1088; at Caesarea, Paul is warned not to proceed to Jerusalem, 1089; arrives at Jerusalem, 1089; is violently abused by certain Jews of Asia, 1090; when about to be scourged claims the privileges of a citizen of Rome, 1091 and n.; is brought before the Sanhedrim, 1091, n.; is smitten by order of the high priest; his resentment of the injury, 1091 and n.; is placed in prison and comforted in a vision, 1092; to avoid the malice of the Jews, is sent by

- Lysias to Casarea, to Felix, 1092; by whom he is well received, 1092 and n.; is accused by Tertullus, 1092; defends himself, 1093; preaches before Felix, is brought before Festus, 1093; appeals to Casar, 1093; is sent by Festus with other prisoners to Rome under the charge of Julius the centurion, 1096 and n.; by whom he is kindly treated, 1096; advises to winter at the Fair Havens; his counsel rejected, 1097 and n.; the ship is beset by the wind called Euroclydon, 1097 and n.; in the distress of the ship's company Paul comforts them with assurance that no lives shall be lost, 1097; forbids the use of the boat, 1097; the ship is wrecked, 1097; Paul and the other prisoners saved from the sword by Julius, 1097; all reach the shore in safety, 1097; they are cast ashore in the isle of Melita, 1098; a viper fastens on Paul's hand and the barbarians judge him to be a murderer, 1098 and n.; he shakes off the reptile and feels no harm, they then esteem him a god, 1098 and n.; he is hospitably treated by Publius; heals his father, 1098 and n.; proceeds to Italy in the ship Castor and Pollux, 1098 and n.; is landed at Puteoli, 1099 and n.; is met on his way by the Christians of Rome, who conduct him into the city, 1099 and n.; he is delivered up to the captain of the guard, 1099 and n.; having arrived in Rome, is cast into prison by Nero, 1104; after various travels arrives in Macedonia, whence he writes his first epistle to Timothy, 1106 and n.; writes his epistle to Titus from Nicopolis, 1106 and n.; passes successively to Corinth, Ephesus, Miletum and Troas; at the latter place lodges with Carpus, 1106 and n.; suffers much persecution, 1107; arrives at Rome and is cast into prison; writes his second epistle to Timothy, 1107 and n.; is beheaded 1108 and n.
- Pectoral, the, 311.
- Pekah usurps the throne of Israel, 623; is invaded by the king of Assyria, 623 and n.; murdered by Hosea, 623 and n.
- Pekahiah succeeds Menahem in the kingdom of Israel, 623; murdered by Pekah, 623.
- Peleg, birth of, 110.
- Peniel, meaning of the term; see Jacob, Pentateuch, 1.
- Pentecost, day of, 1058 and n.
- Perga, city of, 1072, n.
- Persecutions of the Christians, 1101, n.
- Per-eopolis fired by Thais and Alexander, 699, n.
- Persens, fables concerning him, 501.
- Persian kings, their manner of giving dowry to their wives, 721, n.
- Persians, religion of the; the Magians and Sabians, 119.
- Persians had an early and true account of the creation and deluge, 137; made it the foundation of their religion, 137; their notions concerning the heavenly bodies, 138-9.
- Peter (St) proposes to elect one into the number of the apostles in the place of Judas, 1058; his first sermon on occasion of the descent of the Holy Ghost, 1059; thereby converts 3000 souls, 1059; he and John heal the cripple at the Beautiful gate of the temple, 1059; by his preaching converts five thousand hearers, 1059; he and John are thrown into prison, 1060; after Peter's defence they are dismissed, 1060; joining their brethren they are again comforted by a descent of the Holy Spirit, 1060; their converts sell their substance and deposit the money arising in their hands, 1060 and n.; Peter strikes Ananias and Sapphira dead, 1060; great cures effected by him with miraculous power, 1060; is cast into prison, 1061; is set at liberty by an angel, 1061 and n.; he preaches to the people and is again brought before the sanhedrim, 1061; is scourged, 1061; he and John confirm the church in Samaria founded by Philip 1064; cures the paralytic at Lydda, 1067; raises up Dorcas, 1067 and n.; his trance at Joppa, 1067 and n.; visits Cornelius and his relations at Casarea, 1068 and n.; while he is preaching the Holy Spirit descends upon them; they are baptized, 1068 and n.; visits Antioch and is reproved by Paul for inconsistency of conduct, 1075; is cast into prison by Agrippa, an angel delivers him, 1070 and n.; arrives at Babylon, 1083 and n.; writes his first epistle, 1083; after some time returns to Rome, 1104; he opposes Simon Magus and causes his destruction, 1104; is cast into prison by Nero, 1104; is imprisoned at Rome and writes his second general epistle, 1107 and n.; is crucified, 1108 and n.; his grave, &c., 1108, n.
- Pharisees, their origin and tenets, 786.
- Pharaoh king of Egypt, his cruelty to the Israelites, &c.; see Moses.
- Pharaoh, a common name of the Egyptian kings, 144, n.
- Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, 639 and n.
- Philemon, 1100, and n.
- Philip the deacon, by his preaching and miracles in Samaria, converts many, 1063; baptizes the eunuch, 1065 and n.
- Philip of Macedon, his death, 748 and n.
- Philip (St) his works and death, 1110 and n.
- Philippi, town of, 797 and n.
- Philippi, city of, 1076, n.
- Philistines, their origin and country, 435, n.; harass the Israelites, 401.
- Philo the historian, 895 et seq.; his opinion concerning the image of God, 21.
- Phineas, slays Zimri and Cozbi, the action approved by God, 318 and n.
- Phœnicia, account of, 1074, n.
- Pheton, fables concerning him, 501 and n.
- Phrygia, province of, 1075, n.
- Phylactery, 787 and n.
- Physic, the Egyptians' skill in, 261 and n.
- Pilate; see Pontius Pilate.
- Pillar of flame, 269.
- Pillar, Jacob's description of; its consecration, 206-7; its inscriptions, 207-8.
- Pisgah, mount of, 321 and n.
- Pisidia, province of, 1072, n.
- Pi-son, the river, 18.
- Pithom, city of, 236, n.
- Plagues of Egypt, 245; the waters turned into blood, 245.
- Planasia, an island to which Agrippa, grandson of Augustus, was banished; see Augustus Caesar.
- Plantary system, to be included in the Mosaic creation, 2.
- Planets created, 5 and n.
- Poetical epithets applied to the moon, 10 and n.
- Polygam, 44, n., and 883; its lawfulness considered, 160.
- Polytheism, its progress, 139.
- Pomegranates and bells, 311 and n.
- Pompey takes possession of Jerusalem, 794, n.
- Pontius Pilate is made governor of Judea, 851 and n., and 1011 and n.; is banished by Caligula; kills himself, 1131.
- Porphyry, his opposition to Christianity, 701 and n.
- Portius Festus succeeds to the government of Judea, 1093 and n.
- Posts, first institution of, 722, n.
- Potiphar, history of; see Joseph.
- Potter's field, the, 1012, n.
- Priests, their offices, 311.
- Priests of Egypt, their riches and consequence, 252.
- Profane history from, to the coming of the Messiah, 806 et seq.; from the birth of Christ to the completion of the canon of the New Testament, 1129 et seq.
- Prophecies relating to the Messiah, and their fulfilment, 937 et seq.; ancient prophecies obscure, 937 and n.; the delivery of the prophecies, 938 and n.; passages of our Saviour's life verifying the prophecies, 939; the interposition of an overruling providence, necessary to the completion of the prophecies, 940; the Jews evade the prophecies, 941; completion of prophecy, an argument with the first Christians for the truth of Christianity, 941; the Jewish evasion of the prophecies combated, 942.
- Prosenchai, Jewish places of prayer, 1076, n.
- Proselytes of the Jews, 779 and n.
- Ptolemais, city of, 1088, n.
- Ptolemy Euergetes succeeds Ptolemy Philadelphus in Egypt, 751.
- Ptolemy Epiphanes succeeds Ptolemy Philopater in Egypt, 753; marries Cleopatra, 754.
- Ptolemy Philadelphus succeeds Ptolemy Soter in Egypt, 751; desires a copy of the Jewish law, from Eleazar, 751 and n.; the translation of the Seventy.
- Ptolemy Philopater succeeds Ptolemy Euergetes in Egypt, 753; defeats Antiochus the Great; takes the city of Jerusalem; intrudes into the holy place; retreats thence in fear, 753; his conduct towards the Jews; his attempt to destroy them rendered futile, 753; is affrighted at some natural phenomena, and releases the Jews, 753; his character and death, 753, n.
- Ptolemy Soter, takes possession of Egypt; obtains the provinces of Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea, 750; besieges Jerusalem; takes it; carries 100,000 of the people captive, 750.
- Publicans, who they were, 853, n.
- Pullius, governor of Melita; entertains Paul after his shipwreck; by whom his father is restored to health, 1098, and n.
- Pul, king of Assyria, invades Israel, 623 and n.
- Punishments inflicted in Egypt, for killing the sacred animals, 263.
- Purification of Jacob's household, 197, n.
- Purin, feast of, 726, n.
- Puteoli, town of, 1099 and n.

- Pyramids of Egypt, 260, 263 and n.; descriptions of them, 261 and n.; conjectures concerning them, 264, n.
- Pythoness, manner of her inspiration; see Endor, Witch of.
- Q
- Quails, the fall of, 271 and n.
- Quarantania, mountain of, 300.
- R
- Raameses, city of, 236, n.
- Rabbah, city of, 484 and n.
- Rabbinites, their origin, 786.
- Rachel, signification of the name; remarks upon her employment, 191, n.; bargains for Reuben's mandrakes, 192; bears Joseph, 192 and n.; steals her father's gods, 193; her deception respecting them, 194; her monument, 198, n.
- Ragau, plains of, 660 and n.
- Rahab entertains Joshua's spies, 364; she preserves them, 364; assists their escape from Jericho, 365.
- Rainbow, the, 87; whether prior or subsequent to the deluge; philosophical account of opinions respecting, 99 and n.
- Ramah, city of, 433 and n.
- Rape of the Sabines, 427, n.
- Rebecca, sister of Laban, 156 and n.; is met by Eliezer at the well; consents to wed Isaac, 157; her age when married to Isaac, 179, n.; bears Esau and Jacob, 179; their characters, 179; by stratagem obtains the blessing for Jacob, 181 and n.
- Rechabites, who they were, &c., 655 and n.
- Redemption of the Israelites a type of Christ's redemption, 268.
- Red sea, its situation and name, 270, n.; passage of, 285, 288.
- Rehlah, city of, 663 and n.
- Rehoboam succeeds Solomon, 541; the ten tribes revolt from him, 542; he falls into idolatry, 545; appoints Abijah his successor, 545; dies, 546.
- Religion of the early ages, 137.
- Religion, corruption of, 138; commenced in Chaldea, 138.
- Religion of the Egyptians, 262.
- Rephidim, its situation, 273, n.
- Restoration to divine favour, 35.
- Reuben dissuades his brethren from killing Joseph, 209 and n.; pathetic address in behalf of Benjamin, 218.
- Rhegium, town of, 1099 and n.
- Rhodes, island of, 1088, n.
- Richa, village of, 363, n.
- Rimmon the idol, 577.
- Rock, the word considered with reference to Peter's name, 919, n.
- Romans make alliance with the Jews, 773.
- Rome, the building of, 674.
- Ruth, 403; refuses to leave her mother, 403; they go to Bethlehem, 403; Ruth marries Boaz, 403; the Saviour descends, according to the flesh, from her, 403.
- S
- Sabbath instituted, 8 and n.; first observed as a day of rest, 272 and n.; Jewish observance of, 758 and n.
- Sacrifice appointed, 28.; institution of, 47; design of, 50.
- Sacrifices of the patriarchal dispensation, 50.
- Sadducees, their origin and tenets, 785, n.
- Salamis, city of, 1071, n.
- Salathiel succeeds Jehoiachin as prince of the captivity, 686 and n.
- Salem, city of, 343; two places of that name, 167.
- Salmaneser succeeds Tiglath Peleser in Assyria, 624 and n.; invades Israel, 624; demolishes Samaria, 624; reduces the people of Israel to captivity, 624 and n.
- Salmon, mount, 352.
- Samaria, 549 and n.; siege of, 592 and n.; province of, 860, n.
- Samaritans not allowed to assist in rebuilding the temple, 692.
- Samaritans, 746 and n.; their notions on religion, 746; their temple, 747 and n.
- Samos, isle of, 1087, n.
- Samothracia, island of, 1076, n.
- Samson, son of Manoah, 410; marries a woman of the Philistines, 411 and n.; slays a lion, 411; propounds a riddle, 411 and n.; makes a great slaughter of the Philistines, 412 and n.; he is delivered up to them, 412; slays a thousand with the jaw-bone of an ass, 413; carries off the gates of Gaza, 413 and n.; is betrayed by Delilah, 413; overthrows the temple of Dagon, 414.
- Samuel succeeds to the government of Israel, 437 and n.; exhorts the people to leave idolatrous worship, &c., 437; the exactions of his sons incense the people, 438; he anoints Saul king over Israel, 439; resigns the government to him, 440; is sent to Bethlehem by God to anoint David king and successor of Saul, 443 and n.; dies, 450 and n.
- Sanctiatio, the historian, 61.
- Sauhedrim, counsel of, 299, n.; 764 et seq.
- Sarah, wife of Abraham, is promised a son; is incredulous, 149 and n.; bears her son Isaac, 152.
- Sardanapalus, 676; manner of his death, 677 and n.
- Saron, town of, 1067, n.
- Satan, 24 and n.
- Saul meets with Samuel, 438 and n.; is appointed king of Israel, 439; defeats the Ammonites, 440 and n.; he and Jonathan his son defeat the Philistines at Gilgal, 441 and n.; destroys the Amalekites, 442; Samuel expostulates with him for saving Agag, 442 and n.; declines in favour with God, 443; David plays before him, and is made one of his armour bearers, 443 and n.; meets the Philistines at Succoth, 443 and n.; his army defied by Goliath, 443 and n.; David slays Goliath, and Saul envies him the applause of the people, 445; attempts David's life, 445 and n.; gives him to wife his daughter Michal, 445; again conspires against his life, 446-7; attempts his son's life for his friendship to David, 447 and n.; puts to death Ahimelech and the priests for sheltering David, 449; whilst sleeping, David cuts off the skirt of his robe, 450; his life again spared by David, 452; in his extremity consults the witch of Endor, 453 and n.; is reproved by the spirit of Samuel, 454 and n.; he and his son are slain on Gilboa by the Philistines 454, n.
- Saul of Tarsus takes part with the murderers of Stephen, 1063; his persecution of the Christians, 1063; while on his way to Damascus, is arrested by a heavenly vision, 1065 and n.; and struck with blindness, 1065; is cured by Ananias, 1066; is baptized; preaches Christ in the synagogues; plants the gospel in Arabia, 1066 and n.; his life being threatened at Damascus, he escapes to Jerusalem, 1066; his boldness raises anger against him at Jerusalem, and he retires to Tarsus, 1066 and n.; preaches in Cilicia and Syria, 1067.
- Saul and Barnabas preach the gospel in Antioch, 1070 and n.; during a season of scarcity carry supplies to the brethren in Judea, 1070 and n.; return to Antioch; thence to Seleucia, Cyprus, and Salamis, 1071 and n.; preach in the synagogues at Salamis, 1072; thence proceed to Paphos, 1072 and n.; Saul strikes Barjesus with blindness in the presence of Sergius Paulus the procurator of Cyprus, 1072 and n.; Saul obtains the name of Paul, 1072 and n. See Paul.
- Sceptre, meaning of the term, 225.
- Seeva, sons of, their punishment for invoking the Holy Ghost, 1083 and n.
- Scribes, 787; their divisions, 787.
- Seals, 568, n.
- Season of the creation, 7, n.
- Sebaste and Casarea, two cities built by Herod, 802 and n.
- Sects of the Jews, their origin and tenets, 784 et seq.
- Seir, mountains of, 194, n.
- Seir, mount, 351.
- Selah, the town of, 602 and n.
- Seleucia, city of, built by Seleucus Nicator to lessen the splendour of Babylon, 133; description of, 777 and n., 1071, n.
- Seleucus Philopater succeeds Antiochus the Great in Syria, 754; at first favours the Jews; afterwards attempts to plunder their sacred treasury, 755.
- Semiramis, wife of Memnon; marries Ninus; reigns jointly with her son, 134; her stratagem to obtain the crown at Ninus' decease, 135, n.; removes her court to Babylon; attempts the subjugation of India; fails; resigns the sovereignty to Ninus; dies, 135; conjectures respecting her, 135, n.
- Semacherib succeeds Salmaneser in Assyria, 632; advances against Jerusalem, 633; receives tribute from Hezekiah, 633; demands the surrender of Jerusalem, 634; is compelled to abandon it, 635; his forces destroyed by the angel of the Lord, 635 and n.; is slain by his sons, 636.
- Sentence pronounced against our first parents for disobedience, 27.
- Sentence against Cain, 43 and n.
- Sepharvaim, two of, 625 and n.
- Septuagint translation, 751 and n.
- Seraph, 352, n.
- Serpent, the; its subtlety, 24 and n.; its address to Eve, and insidious approaches, 25 and n.
- Serpents, fiery, 332 and n.
- Servants, ancient custom of giving them to the bride, 201.
- Sesostris, 336 and n.; tradition respecting him, 336; conquered the Arabians, 337; subdued Africa, 337; returns to Egypt after the overthrow of the Egyptians in the Red sea, 337; his measures,

- 337; his armies and conquests, 337; subdued India and Scythia, 337 and n.; his great works in Egypt, 338.
- Seth, the birth of, 52.
- Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego carried captive to Babylon, 657; are instructed in all Babylonian learning, 682; are cast into the furnace, 684 and n.; are preserved 684.
- Shallum; see Jehoahaz.
- Shallum usurps the throne of Israel, 623; is slain, 623.
- Shamgar, his slaughter of the Philistines, 401 and n.
- Sheba, queen of, visits Solomon; see Solomon.
- Shechem, its situation, 196, n.
- Shechem: deflowers Dinah, 197; prevails upon Jacob to give her to him in marriage, 197; he and Hamor his father, together with all the Shechemites, slain by Simeon and Levi, 195.
- Shechemites prevailed upon by the sons of Jacob to submit to circumcision, 197; are on the third day after, all slaughtered by Simeon and Levi, their town plundered, and their women and children taken captives, 197.
- Shecinah, the, 706, n.
- Shew-bread, 902 and n.
- Shichnah, description of the, 297, n.
- Shem, the sons of; their settlements, 121; genealogy of his descendants, 122.
- Shibboleth, 410 and n.
- Shiloh, to whom this title applied, 226.
- Shipping, invention of, 137.
- Shishak, king of Egypt, invades the dominions of Rehoboam; enters Jerusalem, and spoils it, 545 and n.
- Shoes, the custom of putting off, 240, n.
- Shunem, city of, 453 and n.
- Shushan, city of, 720 n.
- Sichem, or Sechem, city of, 143, n.
- Sidon, city of, 341-2 and n.
- Silas; see Paul and Silas.
- Siloam, fountain and tower of, 952 and n.
- Simeon, his song, 847 and n.
- Simeon Niger, 1071 and n.
- Simeon, surnamed the Just, succeeds Onias in the chief priesthood, 750; his character, 750 and n.
- Simon succeeds Jonathan as leader of the Jews, 777; is made regal governor of the land by Demetrius, 777; is slain with two of his sons 778 and n.
- Simon Magus, 1104 and n.; his death, 1104 and n.
- Simon, St, his travels, labours and death, 1110 and n.
- Simon the sorcerer, 1064 and n.; offers money to Peter and John for the gift of the Holy Ghost, 1064.
- Simon, leader of a Jewish faction, 1138 and n.
- Sinai, mount of, 274; God there manifests himself to Moses, 274; and delivers the tables of the moral law, 275.
- Sinai, mount of, its situation, 280, n.
- Sisera fights with the Israelites, 401 and n.; his forces overcome, 402 and n.; is slain by Jael, 403 and n.
- Sodom and Gomorrah, the cities of; their destruction, 151 and n. and 353; allusions to their catastrophe by profane authors, 176; manner of their destruction, 177 and n.; remains that attest their former existence, and the nature of the judgment that befel them, 178.
- So, king of Egypt, 624 and n.
- Solomon, son of David, proclaimed king of Israel, 508; receives instructions from his father respecting the building of the temple, 509 and n.; his measures to secure his throne, 510 and n.; marries the daughter of Pharaoh, 511; his celebrated judgment, 511 and n.; extent of his dominion, 512 and n.; solicits Hiram for artificers to assist in building and adorning the temple, 513 and n.; building of the temple commences, 513; solemnly dedicates the temple to God, 535 and n.; builds three palaces, 537 and n.; builds the walls of Jerusalem and a senate house, 538 and n.; cultivates commerce, 538; his great riches, 539 and n.; is visited by the queen of Sheba, 539; falls into great enormities with strange women, 540 and n.; God pronounces a judgment against him, 540; the neighbouring states conspire against him, 540 and n.; dies 541; his riches and his trade to Ophir, 556.
- Solomon's porch, 953, n., 1059 and n.
- Solomona and her sons; their dreadful torments, 757.
- Sons and daughters of men, 53.
- Sons of God, 53; unite with the daughters of men, 54 and n.
- Sosthenes, ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, 1081 and n.; accuses St Paul and is beaten, 1081.
- Soul of man, 14.
- Spies sent to Jericho by Joshua, 364 and n.; are entertained by Rahab, 364; she aids their escape, 365; they return to Joshua with their information, 365.
- Stephen is elected a deacon, 1062; his success in gaining converts, 1062 and n.; is brought before the Sanhedrim, 1062; his defence, 1062-3 and n.; is stoned to death, 1063 and n.
- Stoics, their notions, 1080, n.
- Stones, showers of, 386 and n.
- Succoth, its signification, 196.
- Sueoth-Benoth, 624 and n.
- Sun, creation of the, 5.
- Sun and moon, their motions evidence the wisdom of the Creator, 12.
- Sychar, city of, 860, n.
- Syene, city of, 685, n.
- Synagogues, their origin, 742 and n.; their services, 743 and n.; offices, 745; times of assembling therein, 745.
- Syracuse, city of, 1099 and n.
- Syria, country of, 1067, n.
- Systems of the universe, 2, n.

T

Tabernacle, is built, 297; pillar of the cloud covers it, 297; description of, 310.

Tabernacles, the feast of, 692 and n.

Tabitha raised to life; see Christ.

Table for shew-bread, 311.

Tabor, mount, 351, 402, n.

Tadmor in the wilderness, 538.

Talmud, the, 786.

Tamar is debauched by Ammon, 486 and n.

Tarsus, city of, 1067, n.

Task-masters, the Egyptian, 236, n.

Temptation of Eve, 24 and n.; opinions regarding, 31, 32.

Temple build by Solomon, 513; account of, 530.

Temple, the second, finished and dedicated, 718; passover observed in it, 718.

Tertullus, the orator, 1092 and n.

Testament, New, introduction to, 821 et seq.—Judaism preparatory to Christianity, 821 et seq.; the genuineness and authenticity of the books of the Old and New Testaments, 831 et seq.

Thamar brings forth Pharez and Zarah, 212.

Thebes, city of, built by Mizraim, 134.

Theocracy of the Jews, 468.

Therapeutæ, the, 788, n.

Thesbe, town of, 560, n.

Thessalonica, city of, 1078, n.

Thermuthis, the Egyptian princess who preserved Moses, 238, n.

Thomas, St, his travels, labours, and death, 1110 and n.

Three Taverns, 1090 and n.

Tiberius succeeds Augustus in the Roman empire, 1130; his conduct and character, 1130; causes Agrippa to be murdered, and Germanicus to be poisoned, 1130; receives an account of Christ's passion and resurrection from Pontius Pilate, and proposes to the senate to enrol him amongst the gods, 1130; the senate refusing, he determines on protecting the Christians, 1130; conduct during the latter period of his reign, 1130; appoints Caligula his successor, 1130; is murdered by Caligula and Macro, 1131.

Tiberias, lake of, 352.

Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, 623 and n.; ravages Israel, 623.

Tigranes, king of Armenia, his character, 793, n.

Tigris, the river, 20.

Timothy is made bishop of Ephesus by Paul, 1075.

Tirzah, town of, 623 and n.

Tithes, 190 and n.

Titus is intrusted by Vespasian with the management of the Jewish war, 1137; invests the city of Jerusalem; obtains decisive advantages, and offers the Jews terms through Josephus, 1137; the Jews destroy his engines, 1137; he surrounds the city with a wall or trench, 1138; obtains possession of the temple, which is burned by the soldiery, 1138; drives the Jews from mount Sion, and effects an entire conquest of the city, 1138; he returns in triumph to Rome, 1139; builds an arch to commemorate his victories over the Jews, 1139; succeeds Vespasian in the Roman empire, 1139; prejudices against him removed by his wise government, 1139; his conduct, 1140 and n.; national calamities during his reign; his death, 1140.

Titus is made bishop of Crete, 1075.

Tobias sent by his father to Rages, 626; is guided by the angel Raphael, 626; who delivers him from the fish, 626; marries Sara, 626; cures his father of blindness, 626; his affairs and death, 626.

Tobit carried captive by Salmaneser, 625 and n.; married Anna, 626; has a son, Tobias, 626.

Tolah, son of Puah, succeeds Abimelech, 409.

Tophet, 637 and n., 920, n.

Trachonitis, its situation, &c., 911, n.

Tradition of the heathens respecting the double destruction of the earth, 98; respecting the deluge, 60 and n.

Trajan succeeds Nerva in the Roman empire, 1142; Plutarch his counsellor, 1142; governs wisely, 1142; his persecution of the Christians is abated at the intercession of Pliny, 1143.

- Translation of Enoch and Elijah, 586 et seq.
 Transfiguration of Christ, 922, n.
 Tree of knowledge, 16 and n.; its taste forbidden, 16 and n.
 Tree of life, 16 and n.
 Tribes which separate from Joshua erect an altar on the other side of Jordan, 372; are suspected by the other tribes of idolatry, 372 and n.; excuse themselves, 372 and n.
 Troas, country of, 1076, n.
 Trogyllium, cape of, 1087, n.
 Trophimus, a disciple of St Paul, 1090, n.
 Trumpets, the feast of, 691 and n.
 Tryphim, by the murder of Antiochus, becomes king of Syria, 777; his death, 777.
 Tychicus, a disciple of St Paul, 1101 and n.
 Tyre, city of, 342.
- U
- Uncircumcised lips, remarks upon this expression, 244.
 Unknown God, altar to the, 1079, n.
 Unleavened bread, 247 and n.
 Uriah, his history and death; see David.
 Urim and Thummim, 281 and n.
 Ur of the Chaldees, its site, 123, n.; people of became fire worshippers, 123.
 Uz, land of, where situated, 233.
 Uziah, or Azariah, succeeds Amaziah in Judah, 603; his victories and public works, 607 and n.; is struck with leprosy for impiety, 607 and n.; and retires from the government, 607; events which occurred in his reign, 608; his death, 608.
- V
- Vashti, queen of Ahasuerus the second, 720 and n.; refuses to present herself at the banquet, 720 and n.; is deposed to make way for Esther, 721.
 Veil, ancient use of the, 157, n.
 Vespasian declared emperor of Rome on the death of Vitellius, 1137; commits the management of the war against the Jews to Titus, 1137; arrives in Rome, and is received in triumph, 1138; the war with the Jews being terminated, he cultivates the arts of peace, and by a judicious government, gives stability to his empire, 1139; his death, 1139.
 Victim of the sacrifice, 42, n.
 Viper, the, 332, n., 1098, n.
 Vitellius acknowledged emperor by the army and senate on the death of Otho, 1136; his cruelties and ill government, 1136; an insurrection in favour of Vespasian, 1136; Rome taken by Antonius on his behalf, and Vitellius slain, 1136.
 Voice of the Lord, 26 and n.
- W
- Walking with God, 53, n.
 War and navigation, arts of, greatly improved by Semiramis and Niuis, 136.
 Washing of hands, as denoting innocency, 1015, n.
 Water and earth separated, 4.
 Water, the drawing of, 155, n.
 Waters of Egypt turned into blood, 245.
 Weaning feast, 160.
 Wild honey, 357.
 Window, 73 and n.
 Windows of heaven, 77.
 Wisdom of God in the works of creation, 12.
 Wise men are guided by a star to the abode of Jesus, 848 and n.; make presents to him, 848 and n.; they depart into their own country, 848.
 Woman created, 7 and n.
- X
- Xerxes succeeds his father, Darius the second, in the kingdom of Persia, 719; his passage across the Hellespont into Greece, 719 and n.; his defeats and death, 719 and n.
- Z
- Zaccheus, his conversion; see Christ.
 Zachariah stoned by order of Joash, 601.
 Zacharias, 841 and n.; an angel announces to him the birth of John, 841 and n.; is incredulous and afflicted with dumbness, 842 and n.; is restored to speech on the birth of his son, 841 and n.
 Zarephath, town of, 561 and n.
 Zechariah is placed on the throne of Israel, 622 and n.; is murdered by Shallum, 623.
 Zechariah the prophet, 717, n.
 Zedekiah is made king of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar, 658; is incited to revolt by the neighbouring nations, but dissuaded from doing so by Jeremiah, 658; confederates with Pharaoh Hophra king of Egypt against Nebuchadnezzar, 662; Jerusalem is taken, and his sons slain, his eyes are put out, and he is carried in fetters to Babylon, 663 and n.
 Zephaniah the prophet, 654, n.
 Zerubabel, one of the leaders in the return from Babylonish captivity, 691 and n.
 Ziglax, town of, 452 and n.
 Zimri slays Elah, 549; his death, 318 and n., and 549.
 Zion, mount, 352.
 Zipporah; see Moses.
 Zoan, a city of Egypt built by Mizraim the son of Ham, 134.
 Zoroastres, 808 and n.

INDEX

OF

SCRIPTURAL PASSAGES,

APPLIED, ILLUSTRATED, AND EXPLAINED IN THIS WORK.

OLD TESTAMENT.

GENESIS.			Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
			5	22, 24	643	11	10	72	18	1, 8	148
Ch.	Ver.	Page	5	24	587	11	15	117	18	4	148
1	2	1, 394	5	32	71, 72	11	22	1116	18	6	148
1	15	909	6		53	11	26	1116	18	7	148
1	11	96	6	2	58	11	31	158, 684	18	8	149, 581, 868
1	14	69, 96	6	3	673	12		188	18	17, 22	178
1	16	5, 10, 388	6	4	58	12	3	637, 643, 821	18	19	233
1	20	2, 5	6	5	1056	12	4	123, 258	18	21	149
1	24	6	6	5, 12	149	12	6	154	18	25	643, 821
1	26	6, 23	6	11	56	12	6, 7	747	19	1, 2	150
1	26, 27	21	6	11, 6	589	12	8	367	19	11	610
1	27	7	6	16	73	13	4	310, 747	19	14	165
1	28	96	6	18	71	13	5, 6	125	19	22	175, 178
1	28—30	15	6	19	60	13	10	176, 353	19	24	151, 355
1	29	96	7	2	67	13	22	70	19	24, 25	177
1	29, 30	80, 99	7	10, 12	395	14		125	19	26	556
1	36	21	7	11	2	14	3	176	20	4—9	103
2	6	4	7	19	75	14	6	314	20	5	138
2	8	20	7	23	75	14	7	339	20	7	179, 613
2	8, &c.	18	8	2	80	14	10	146	20	12	123, 152
2	9	22	8	4	971, 1018	14	15	628	20	18	144
2	10	20	8	6	73	14	17, 18	526	21	5	258
2	16	15	8	7	582	14	18	523	21	5, 12	579
2	16, 17	106	8	11	563	14	18, 20	103	21	6	148
2	18	11, 882	8	21	57	14	19	138	21	8	160
2	19	22	8	22	54, 95, 96	14	22	155, 243	21	10	152
2	21	7	9	1, 2	130	15	2	628	21	12	161
2	23	7, 22	9	2	96, 100	15	3	159	21	19	316
2	23, 24	10	9	3	96	15	4	159	21	21	405
3	8	310	9	3, 4	106	15	7	243, 557	21	22	213, 331
3	10	29	9	4	103	15	8	164, 842	21	23	153
3	15	34, 643, 938, 939	9	5	51	15	9, &c.	399	21	33	310
	16	43	9	6	493, 783	15	12, 15	837	22	1	310
3	17, 18	100	9	11	75	15	13	218	22	1, 2	213
3	20	16, 45	9	19	111	15	13, 16	259	22	8	938
3	22	28	9	20, 21	548	15	16	103, 375	22	9	154
4		47	9	24	102	15	17	42, 99, 564	22	11	543
4		124	9	26	123	16	2	159	22	11, 15	841
4	1	35	9	32	123	16	5	508	22	12	154
4	3	310	10		128	16	7	841	22	14	243
4	4	42	10	2	703	16	13	148	22	16	330
4	4	643	10	8	117	16	14	156	22	18	643, 821
4	8	43	10	11	133, 623	17		161	22	20	154
4	11	47	10	17	489	17	1	914	23	3	53
4	16, 17	46	10	19	341	17	5	920	23	3, 10, 17	1116
4	17	52, 53	10	21	72	17	6	150	23	6	213
4	18	52	10	30	558	17	10	148	23	11	155
4	21	461	10	32	122, 111, 124	17	11, 25, 27	171	23	16	155, 196, 498
4	25	35	11	1	111, 117	17	13, 14	376	24	2	884
4	26	243	11	2	89, 91, 111	17	16	148	24	2, 3	155
5		69	11	4	112	17	17	123	24	11	155
5	3	45	11	5	149	17	19	143, 643	24	15	156
5	4	45, 52	11	6	112, 468	18		821	24	20	156
5	5, &c	587	11	7	103	18	1	148	24	22	156

INDEX OF SCRIPTURAL TEXTS.

1171

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	EXODUS.			Ch.	Ver.	Page
24	37	155	35	27	213				17	6	273
24	53	156	35	28, 29	186				17	8, &c.	442
24	59	157	36		125, 196	Ch.	Ver.	Page	17	12	272
24	60	157, 885	36	6	184	1	20, 21, 22	237	17	13, 14	458
25	1, 3	553	36	8, 9	194	2	1	250	17	14	738
25	2	157, 209, 233	36	12	273, 339, 458	2	16	156	17	14, 26	469
25	6	161, 401	36	21, 22	194	2	23	251	17	16	273
25	8	643	36	31	188	3	1	239, 298	18	11, 12	239
25	13, &c.	153	36	35	340	3	2	240	18	19	948
25	15	790	36	43	124	3	6	6, 998, 1095	18	21, 22	368
25	18	19	37	14	213	3	11	251	18	22	274
25	26	258, 412	37	25, 28	340	3	12	251, 279	18	24	766
26		143, 326	37	28	405	4	11	241	19	3, &c.	457
26	3, 4	143	37	30	587	4	14	251	19	4	288
26	4	188, 613, 821	37	36	209, 1064	4	20	242	19	13	274, 279, 377
26	28	213, 331	38	12	411	4	21, 25	252	19	16	565
26	28, 29	153	38	13	243	4	25	242	19	20	437
26	31	195	39	1	1064	4	26	253	20	4	425
27	16	181	39	17	192	4	31	257	20	5	515
27	33	185, 189	40	18	1043	5		243	20	7, 8	284
27	36	920	40	20	914	5	21	257	20	9, 14	620
27	40	222	41	1	845	6	3	243	20	12	275, 598
28	9	195	41	13	579	6	18	238	20	16	325
28	12	206	41	26	1043	6	20	238	20	19	765, 841
28	12, 1	856	41	46	191, 259	7	1	244	20	24	275
28	12, 17	837	41	53, 54	191	7	1, 2	334	20	25	760
28	13	643	42	18	613	7	5, 17	244	21, &c.		509
28	14	821	42	36	587	7	7	259	21	7	730
28	15	205	43	4, 5	216	7	10, 11, 12	256	21	10	845
28	16, 17	207	43	7	230	7	11, 12	257	21	14	280, 508
28	17	551	43	9	216	7	12	670	21	32	1004
28	18	190, 439	43	11	216	8	9	254	22	3, 8	284
28	20	199	43	14	230	8	19	981	22	16	197
29	1	191, 404	43	34	102, 877	8	26	247, 284	22	21	331
29	12	909	44	5	229	9	8	246	22	21, 24	612
29	18	552	44	15	229	9	23	246, 387	22	25	731
29	21	191	44	26	216	9	31, 32	423	22	28	489, 568
29	24, 29	886	44	33, 34	218	10	1	46	22	29	179
29	31	959	45	6	191, 220, 259	11	2	393	23	4, 5	612
29	32	192	45	8	214, 613, 902	11	5	661	23	12	275, 958
30	1	879	45	22	997	12		288, 857	23	16	7, 275
30	8	412	45	28	218, 230	12	3	247	23	20, 21	278
30	25	191	46	4	219	12	11	1005, 1043	23	27	370
30	27	217	46	11	413	12	15	248	23	29, 30	371, 383
30	43	161	46	12	211	12	16	902	23	32	380
31	4, 8	351	46	26	219	12	18	423	23	33	330, 380
31	7	193	46	30	219	12	26, 27	248	24	1, 9	948
31	12	199	46	34	215	12	34	248	24	4	321
31	14, 15	203	47	4	259	12	35	393	24	9, 11	362
31	27	461	47	9	191	12	40	147, 255, 258, 259	24	11	276
31	43	239	47	11	541	12	43	366	24	17	297
31	44	331	47	31	221	12	46	1021	25	to 30	303
31	46	194	48	7	846	13	2	845	25	10, 22	706
31	49, 50	680	48	14	221, 965, 1027	13	4	423	25	18, 20	379
32	1	201, 477	48	16	6, 640	13	9	787	25	39	633
32	10	200	48	22	227, 373	13	19	225	27	1, &c.	629
32	11	188	49		103, 169, 183	13	20	287	27	6	379
32	13	194	49	3	179	13	20, 21	278	28	6	434
32	20	188	49	4	198	13	21	536	28	30	281
32	24	412	49	8	222, 355	13	49	612	28	33	281
32	26	202	49	9	1109	14	2	681	29	7	439
32	27	920	49	10	143, 222, 225,	14	13, 14	270, 287	29	39	1059
33	3	188			643, 649, 821, 840,	14	19, 20	278, 286	30	6, &c.	841
33	4	194			841, 871, 939	14	22	252	30	12	519
33	6, 7	473	49	11	371	14	24, 35	287	30	12, 15	857
33	10	188	49	12	355, 357	14	25	286, 325	30	13	994
33	19	1116	49	13	371	14	27, 28	288	30	13, 16	946
33	20	747	49	17	411	15		461	30	15, 16	856
34	6	213	49	20	198	15	8	285	30	23	439
34	12	552	49	21	856	15	11, &c.	373	32		625
34	14	211	49	28	227	15	20	271	32	1	283, 457
34	27	202	49	29	223	15	23	271	32	3, 4	276
34	30	209	50	2	223	15	30	461	32	4	283
35	2	200	50	3	224, 968	16	3, 13	304	32	6	276
35	7, 14	191	50	10	224	16	8	902	32	20	548
35	10	143	50	13	1116	16	14	930	32	23	26, 277
35	17	434	50	26	225	16	15	272	32	27	460
35	19	846, 879				16	29	758	32	32	282
35	19, 20	846				17	1	273	32	35	284

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
33	4	278	20	27	472, 643	17	19	70	DEUTERONOMY.
33	17	434	21	5	669	18	3	480	Ch.	Ver.	Page
33	19	249	21	10	1010	18	7	607	1	15	765
34	6, 7	250	21	18, 21	798	18	15, 16	847	1	16, 17	949
31	7	583	21	21, 22	637	18	19	174	1	17	274, 468
31	17	425	22	12	844	20	1	299, 323	1	18	112
34	22	7	23	12	747	20	10	323	2	4, 5	189
34	27, 28	276	23	15	1058	20	11, 12	556	2	7	325
31	28, &c.	926	23	17, 18	747	20	12	323	2	9, 10, 11	227
35	25, 26	325	23	27	537	20	23, 28	314	2	11	58
38	25, 26	556	23	34, 36, 42, 43	827	20	29	968	2	12	194, 314
40	15	319	23	36	535	21	1	631	2	21	58
40	34, 35	536	23	40	971	21	1, 11	313	2	25	382
LEVITICUS.			24	5, &c.	902	21	2	410	2	28, 29	340
1	4	855	24	11	297	21	6	332, 333	3	8	320
2	11	358	24	15, 16	866	21	12	176	3	11	315
3	2	855	24	16	940, 567, 568, 1013	21	13	151	3	13	911
4	4	855	25	9	7	21	22	341	3	14	409
4	6	316	25	14, 17, 25, 28	568	21	26	321	3	17	353
4	23	630	25	23	537	22	5	326	4	7, 8	620
5	3	864	25	35	612	22	6	328	4	8	310, 1055
5	5	221	25	42, 55	331	22	18	578	4	15	284
6	12	306	26	1	207	22	20	328	4	15, 16	425
6	12, 13	297	26	3, &c.	762	22	31	316	4	19	139, 353, 395
9	22	1027	26	19, 20	254	22	32	921	4	30, 31	636, 722
9	24	42, 309, 562, 564, 706	26	23, 24	910	22	38	327	4	34	620
10	1	307	27	27	917	23	1, 2	316	5	4	1055
10	4	909	27	5	428	23	20, 21	325	5	15	1025
10	9, 10	307	27	28, 29	429	23	23	325, 326	6	8	787
10	11	955	NUMBERS.			23	24	326	6	11	186
11	22	852	1		283	24	5, &c.	820	6	13	855
11	26	592	3	32	665	24	15, 16	339, 460	6	16	855
12	1, 2	844	4	15	480, 497	24	17	317, 327, 880	7	1, 4	734
12	6, 8	847	4	20	455	24	21	402	7	2	330, 515
13		733, 864	5	2, 3	593	25	25	1057, 1058	7	3, 4	57
13	14, &c.	864	5	7	221	25	1, 2	57, 276	7	4	380
14		864	5		411	25	4	318, 324	7	5	330, 560, 637
14	1, &c.	865	6		842	25	5	324	7	6	734
14	2, &c.	948	6	24	497	25	5, 18	318	7	16	330
14	7, &c.	577	7	9	497	25	6	324	8	2	279, 332
16	2	307, 379, 706	9	10, 11	631	25	7	460	8	3	581, 854
16	12	306, 841	10	8, 9	319	25	11	324	8	4	325, 988
16	21	221	10	10	630	25	12	70, 324	8	7	358
16	29	2, 1096	10	11	396	25	13	324, 789	8	15	332
17		105	10	29	402, 416	25	14	324	9	4, &c.	375
17	4	596	10	31	308	26		223	9	18, 19, 25, 26	303
17	7	670	11	5	305	26	53, &c.	371	9	24	249, 323
17	8	425	11	7	703	27	18	1062	10	6, 7	314
17	10	106	11	8	272	27	21	378, 425, 457	10	10	303
17	11	105	11	11, &c.	766	28	9, 10	747	10	16	173, 376, 858
17	12	104	11	15	765	28	11	747	10	19	331, 612
18		105	11	34	304	28	16, 24	747	10	20	183
18	3	379	12	1	307, 325	28	27	747	10	22	219
18	3, 1	281	12	1, 8	824	29	8	747	11	11	346
18	4	375	12	5	278	29	12, &c.	692	11	29	368
18	11	486	12	6	328, 845	29	13	747	11	30	154
18	12, 13	754	12	8	362, 938	29	36	747	12	1	858
18	15	859	12	10	864	30	2	430	12	3	380
18	21	350	13	6	396	30	13	433	12	7	480
18	22	150	13	11	135	31	7, &c.	404	12	9, 8, 14	381
18	28	330, 392	13	20	1039	31	16	317	12	11	637
19	15	1091	13	23	222	31	22, 23	366	12	13, 14	233
19	17	508, 1041, 1122	13	24	1639	31	27	662	12	14	425
19	17, 18	612	13	25	1039	32	29	409	12	23	106
19	17, 18, 31	612	13	26	299	32	41	409	12	31	429, 430
19	18	951	14	33	58	32	42	53	13	1	256
19	26, 31	643	14	12	283	33		271, 314	13	6	508
19	28	681	14	18	330	33	32, 38	314	13	6, &c.	667
20	2, 3	432	14	33	400	33	36	299	13	6, 9	583
20	3	304	14	34	393	34	7, 8	351	13	8, 9	426
20	6	472	14	36, 37	300	34	11	353	13	12, 13, &c.	381
20	13	150	11	44, 45	455	35	21	487	13	13	504
20	15	34	15	31	298	35	31	493	14	4	15
20	18	953	15	42	278	36	6	844	14	21	105
20	19	751	17	4	302	36	59	238	15	2	730
20	23, 25	1668	17	10	323	43	6, 8	287	15	12, &c.	662
			17	12, 13	369				16	2	1012

INDEX OF SCRIPTURAL TEXTS.

1175

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	H. KINGS.			Ch.	Ver.	Page
5	15, 17, 18	348	15	18	628				10	32	613
5	17	514	15	20	353				10	32, 33	594
6	1	396, 499	15	22	759	Ch.	Ver.	Page	11		505
6	5, &c.	379	15	25	637	1	4	579	11	2	600
6	11, 15	541	15	31	533	1	8	565, 566, 573	11	14	600
6	12	541	16	2	549	1	9, &c.	561	12	9	999
6	20	706	16	3	549	1	10, &c.	580, 947	12	20	544, 525
7	2	537	16	8	637, 678	1	12	177	13	1	603, 626
7	2, 17	577	16	10	678	1	17	575, 678	13	10	678
7	7	537	16	24	556	2		580	13	14	604, 611
7	10	593	16	25	549	2	3	573	13	17	611
7	12	593	16	29	575, 678	2	5	446	13	19	611
7	15, 21	600	16	31	560	2	11	60, 580, 927	13	18	202
8		570	16	33	580	2	11, &c.	571	13	21	574
8	9	302, 535, 706	16	34	363, 307	2	12	604	14	8	602
8	27	523	17	1	559, 562	2	14	376	14	9	350, 603
8	48,	689	17	4	489	2	16	573, 587, 1065	14	14	239
8	63	535	17	6	582	2	19	575	14	17	606, 678
8	66	537	17	12	561	2	21, 22	363	14	18	603
9	1, 2	536	17	18	862	2	24	544	14	22	538, 628
9	3	536	17	19	864	3	1	573, 575, 678	14	23	678
9	15	525	17	24	605	3	2	615	14	25	561, 949
9	16	551	18		402	3	7	575	14	26	545
10	1	553	18	1	560	3	15	461	14	27	605
10	13	553	18	3	561	3	16	575	15		623
10	14, 15	557	18	4	583	3	17	576	15	1	678
10	15, 20	581	18	7	684	3	25	576	15	2, 33	533
10	16	540	18	10	582	3	27	42, 576	15	8	678
10	17	537, 545	18	12	574, 1065	4	1, &c.	576	15	8, &c.	778
10	20	539	18	17	580	4	8, &c.	576	15	10	623
10	21	540, 541	18	22	562	4	23	742	15	27	678
10	22	539, 663	18	24, &c.	981	4	34	576, 864	15	29	398, 648, 806
10	24	557	18	26	562	4	38	446	15	30	678
10	26	522	18	26—28	562	4	41	577	15	33	626, 678
10	27	253	18	38	561, 930	5	6	577	15	35	627
10	29	593	18	42	564	5	10	199, 953	16	1	678
11		521	18	45	576	5	12	481	16	2	629
11	1	593	19		580	5	17, 18	578	16	6	538
11	3	540	19	4	587	5	18	577	16	7, 10	806
11	5, 7	554	19	6, 8	302	5	23	276	16	9	828
11	23, &c.	628	19	8	581	6	5, 6	577	16	17, 18	629
11	30, 31	584	19	10	582	6	18	150, 610	17		917
11	36	506	19	11, &c.	565	6	19	610	17	1	630, 678
11	38	625	19	11—13	582	6	21	614	17	2	624
11	41	533	19	12	26	6	23	591	17	6	650, 1117
11	42	500, 533	19	13	565	6	25	305, 565, 592	17	21	550
11	43	528	19	16	595	6	26	592	17	24	727
12	1—20	678	19	17	565	6	32	592	17	25	624
12	4	537, 551	19	18	565	8	4	593	18	1	630
12	6	541, 946	19	21	566	8	10	576, 610	18	2	533, 629, 632
12	10	551	20	10	422	8	11, 12	583	18	4	631
12	11	551	20	12	566	8	12	594	18	5	632
12	23, &c.	545	20	14	566, 579	8	20	182, 189, 339,	18	9	860
12	25—33	625	20	23	270, 586	8		538	18	10	678
12	32—33	979	20	28	567	8	16	537, 575, 627,	18	11	399
13	2	643	20	30	586	8		678	18	13	632
13	4, 6	865	20	32	567	8	18	613	18	15	556
13	20	543	20	35	584-5	8	30, 38	1067	18	15, 16	778
13	23	543	21		596	9		603	18	21	634
13	26	544	21	2	568	9	2	595	18	22	634
13	32	544	21	8	568	9	8	613	18	25	644
14		546	21	19	595	9	11	555, 933	19	7	634
14	8	541	21	19, 21, 29	595	9	13	595, 971	19	7, 35	586
14	10	545	21	23	568	9	14	595	19	12	18
14	10, 11	549	21	27	569	9	15	595	19	23	635
14	13	544	21	27—29	569	9	22	595, 614	19	29	252
14	15	625	21	41	678	9	24,—27	678	20	6	632
14	16	550	22	4	575	9	25	509	20	9	616
14	21, 31	541	22	11	202, 554	9	26	596	20	19	633
14	23, 24	550	22	15	569	9	27	613	21	18, 26	528
14	25, 26	336	22	38	569	10	1	597	21	3, 7	637
14	29	533	22	39, 45	533	10	1, 6	598	22	1	533
15	2	196, 545	22	42	533, 575	10	9	598	22	7	545
15	3	546	22	43	559, 571	10	10	613	22	8	550, 638
15	10	533	22	43—50	571	10	11	615	22	11	550
15	12	545, 559	22	49	571	10	15	598	22	12	654
15	13	547	22	51	575, 637, 678	10	19	615	22	13	638
15	33	678	23	3	600	10	22	997	22	14	446
15	17	433				10	29	613	23	4	637

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
9	8	539	24	7, 9	940	89	40	330	18	4	980
11	15	42	26	6	198 1015	90	10	70, 500	18	18	730
12	5	101	27	2, &c.	612	91	1, &c.	520	18	24	612
16	15	26	28	2	379	91	6	953	19	11	612
17	1	460	28	4, 5	612	91	11	855	19	18	730
19	23	235	29	4—6	350	91	13	950	20	1	102
19	24	339	31	5	940	94	1	612	20	4	95
23	17	518	33	7	77	94	23	664	20	22	612
27	21	586	33	9	391	95	11	313	23	31	102
28	18	553	33	10	374	96	5	391	24	11, 12	250
29	12, 17	250	34	7	640	99	6	459	24	29	612
30	20	518	34	14	612	101	5	612	25	14	576
31	20	518	34	18	464	101	8, 9	200	25	21	612
31	26	391	34	20	1021	102	25	1030	26	25	43
31	26, 27	139	35	4, 5	764	104	2	4	27	10	612
31	35, 36	600	35	12—15	612	104	4	28, 586	29	12	518
32	22	587	37	1, 8, 21, 26	612	104	5	92	30	1	1037
33	14	523	37	27	613	104	6, 7, 8	9	30	3	518
33	14, 15	696	37	35	685	104	24	2, 15	31	1	1037
35	1	235	38	1	509, 518	105	13, 14	159	31	7	940
35	11	14	38	12—14	612	105	15	841	31	13	1018
36	1	235	39	1	612	105	16	583	31	13—19	434
37	18	4	39	9	307	105	17, 18	229
38	4, 6	8	40	1, 3	612	105	37	288
38	4, 7	2	41	9	940	105	39	279
38	7	685	41	10	996	106	2	15	1	5	388
38	29	2	42	1	349	106	20	284	1	13	511
38	37	2	42	3	969	106	28	643	2	8	461
39	28, &c.	964	44	3, 4	373	106	33	323	2	5	16
40	1	235	45	8	539	106	36	627	2	10, 11	554
40	4, 5	235	45	9, 13	156	106	37, 38	304	2	18, 19	541-2
41	1	100	45	10, 11	522	107	21, 22	15	5	1, 2	208
41	31	14	45	12	886	107	25, 29	911	5	2	431
42	6	235	45	12—16	885	109	4, 5	612	5	4	431
43	7	416	48	1, 2	524	110	1	999	8	11	375
			49	11	53	110	2	363	9	7	644
			50	2	524	112	5, 9	612	10	8	333
			50	5	509	118	25	972	10	16	511
			50	7, &c.	97	119	137	326	12	13	554
			50	10, 11	304	120	6, 7	612	12	14	556
			50	16, &c.	949	123		43	38	5	271
			51		485	127	3	160
			51	10	888	127	ver. ult.	155
			55	7	854	132	11	939
			55	17	1059	132	13, 14	363, 524	1	6	883
			56	23	587	132	17	506	2	15	422
			56	12, 13	464	133	1—3	612	2	19	1039
			58	4, 5	333	135	6	391, 620	3	6	885
			59	14, 15	597	136	5	2	3	11	885
			63	10	422	136	6	77	4	4	524
			68	14	352	137	8, 9	594	4	8	349
			68	18	940	139	7	618	4	12	961
			69	8	880, 883	139	12	475	4	13	16
			69	21	940	139	14, 15	14	4	15	349
			69	28	283	139	16	283	5	12	355
			72	16	350	141	5	1122	6	4	623
			75	5	518	147	15, 18	489	7	5	885
			75	9, 10	967	147	19	616	8	1, 2	887
			76	10	421, 613				8	2	350
			77	14, 19	288
			77	16	271
			78	13	285
			78	14	279	1	6	668
			78	20, 21	304	1	26, 27	762	1	4, &c.	943
			78	24	279	3	4	613	1	15	951
			78	27	272	3	9	49	1	26	878
			78	45	246	3	13	553	2	1—3	363
			78	47, 48	246	4	4	613	2	2	350, 940
			78	60, 61	399	8	10	958	2	2, &c.	823
			78	66	436	8	11	553	2	2, 3	1114
			78	66	436	8	23	92	2	10—14	352
			78, 105,		1063	8	27, 28	77	2	12, 13	350
			106, 135			9	5	916	2	19	1016
			81	16	357	11	13	185	4	3	283, 950
			88	5	607	11	17	612	5	2	939
			89		845	15	2	85	5	12	413
			89	4	939	15	17	612	6	9	1038
			89	9	911	16	33	721	6	9, 10	929
			89	17	700	17	12, &c.	490	6	10	613
			89	29	995	17	17	612	6	11, 12	1001

PSALMS.

ECCLESIASTES.

CANTICLES.

PROVERBS.

ISAIAH.

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
7		871	38	10	920	15	3	509, 597	51	15	13
7	2	871	38	21	333	16	6, 7	681	51	25, 26, 37	120
7	9	628	39	1	623, 807	16	14, 15	652	51	36	688
7	13, 14	647, 871	39	7	682	17	2	554	51	57	689
7	14	627, 878, 902, 939	40	3	939	17	5, 6	355	51	59	659
8	4	627	40	6	157	17	21	901	51	59, 64	658
8	6	525	40	11	955	17	21, 22	901	52	30	672
8	9, 10	613	40	12	422	18		658
9	2, 6	939	40	16	350	18	14	349
9	3	613	41	1	939	18	16	178
9	6	6, 250, 845, 902, 939	42	1	824	20	11	731
9	6, 7	843	42	2	854, 939	21	9	657	1	12	1031
9	7	872, 843, 995	42	2, 3	932	22	11	654	3	33	249, 235, 580
9	10	617	43	2	238	22	15	685	4	53, 55, 56	663
10	5, &c.	426	43	3	583	22	18, 19	307, 657	4	4, 5	663
10	7	415	43	9	15	22	24—30	657	5	5	222
10	8	145	44	3	979	22	30	686	5	18	422
10	9	639	44, 46		708	23	1, 2	1041
10	27	222	45	1	583, 610, 617	23	30	868
11	2	981	45	1—4	710	23	40	178	1		703
11	3	841	45	15	1079	24		658	1	5	281
11	6, 7	80	45	25	37	25	8, &c.	690	1	6	703
11	9	585	46	1, 2	435	25	9	682	1	15—21	703
11	10, 11	129	46	3	50	25	11	656	1	16	703
11	11, &c.	653	46	19	46	25	15, &c.	669	1	17	703
11	11, 12	652	49	2	565	26	20	654	1	18	703
12	3	828	49	5	823	27	2, &c.	617	1	19	703
13	1	873	49	14	1019	27	6	682	1	24	26, 703
13	1—22	707	49	16, 17	653	27	7	687	4	1, 2	378
13	7	688	50	1	730	27	8	222	4	1—3	672
13	9, &c.	1107	50	6	734	27	17	657	4	5, 6	672
13	19	688	51	1, 2	249, 331	28	28	641	4	16	672
13	20	178	53		534, 872, 939	29	3	654	5	5	524
13	22	518	53	3	880, 939	29	5, 7	226	5	8, 9	670
14	13, &c.	714	53	4,	943	29	7	612, 658	5	10	592, 663
14	15	129	53	4, 5, 6	939	29	10	656	5	13	83
14	23	688	53	7	824, 940	29	10, 11	690	6	4, &c.	808
14	29	37, 332	53	7, 8	1065	29	23	658	8		837
17	1	613	53	9	940, 1021	29	26	595	8	1	592
19	1—4	634	53	12	940, 996	30	9	362	8	11	654, 765
19	16	114	56	7	994	31	15	879	10	15	281
19	17	114	57	1	644	31	22	844	11	20	659
19	19	114	58	10, 7	331	31	31, &c.	825	12	2	929
19	19	114	58	11	980	31	33	858	12	3	1089
20	2	1089	59	20	653	32	4	663	12	3, 4	554
20	2, 3	554	60	18	652	33	9	4	12	11, &c.	670
20	3, 4	671	61	1	862	34	5	518	12	15	663
21	9	120	61	11	885	35	2, &c.	598	13	9	422
21	13	157	62	4	653	35	7	598	13	11	387
22	2	447	62	8	330	35	18, 19	655	13	28	26
22	13	186	62	11	971	36	5	655	14	1	592
22	15	933	63	12	285	36	10	654	14	14	694
22	20	933	65	19	652	36	30	657	14	21	98
22	21	666	66	16	177	36	30, 31	656	16	6	171
23	4	518			37	37		658	16	15	670
23	7, 12	342	JEREMIAH.			38	2	657	16	20, 21	627
26	19	1095			40	5	705	16	48		176
27	1	37, 699	1	1, 2	673	38	5, 17	665	17	3, 12	699
27	13	653	1	5	919	41	6	706	17	5, 6	685
28	4	1039	1	10	613	41	17	504	18	26	979
28	7	328	2	6	359	42	14	681	19	6, &c.	657
28	21	497	2	21	413	43	2, 3	681	19	12	586
29	9	613	3	1	670	43	10	682	20		1063
29	17	348	3	14—19	825	44	1	681	20	5, &c.	304
30	6	332	5	21	929	44	16	682	21	22	378
31	1	370, 973	5	22	14	44	18	548	21	26	679
32	1, 2	980	6	6	771	44	26	330	21	27	679
34	3, &c.	1107	6	10	244	44	27, 28	683	23	3, &c.	670
31	6	964	7	11	994	46	1, 2	639	23	3—5	343
35	1—6	350	7	18	518	46	10	964	23	30, 31	595
35	4, &c.	906	7	25, &c.	617	46	11	223	23	31, 32	1007
35	5	982	8	17	333	48	7	435	23	37—39	627
35	5, 6	939, 981	9	23, &c.	716	48	28	699	26	3	343
35	7	359	9	25	366	49	7	121	26	7	843
37		90	9	25, 26	172	49	19	364	26	30	486
37	12	18	9	26	244	50, 51		658	27	17	1071
37	14, 15	634	10	12	4	51		708	27	39	435
37	29, 34	543	10	13	394	51	9	1083	28	24	1127
38	8	99, 646—8	13	14	83	51	14	330	29	3	144, 699

LAMENTATIONS.

EZEKIEL.

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
30	15	236	6	1, 2	688	2	2	901	10	11	1037
31	3	685	6	2, 3	689	4	2	330	11	1	351
31	3, &c.	699	6	7	667	4	9	586	11	17	865
34	2, &c.	1011	6	8	689	5		625	12	10	1021
34	16	955	6	10	73, 1067	5	25, 26	317	13	1	923, 1052
34	23, 24	362, 870	6	10, 13	1059	6	10	548	13	4	566
34	28	652	6	17	1022	7		628	13	7	1007
35	9	178	6	17, 18	568	7	10, &c.	605	14		939
36	26	858	7		687	8	7	330	14	5	1037
37	25, &c.	653	7	4	677	8	9, 10	1038	14	7	1001
38 & 39		703	7	9, 10	927	8	11	585	14	8	607
38	2	704	7	13	856, 902, 906				14	9	148
38	2, &c.	704	7	13, 14	995, 1028				14	20	631
38	8	704	7	14	843
38	9, &c.	704	8		687	1	3	605
38	10 &c.	704	8	1, &c.	692	1	9	561
38	15	704	8	2	693	1	16	620	2	4, 7	955
38	21	703	8	7	700	1	17	618, 621	3		939
38	22	387	8	8	700	2	2	619, 621	3	1	734, 841, 855
38	22, &c.	704	8	9, &c.	700	2	3	619	3		939
39	4	703	8	18	299	2	5, 6	621	3	1, &c.	1037
39	9, 10	703	8	20	1043	3		126	4	2	858
39	11	703, 704	9		690, 939	3	2	609	4	5, 6	574
39	12	828	9	1	727	3	3	134
39	17, 18	964	9	2	740	3	6	606
39	29	652	9	11, 13	740	3	7	606
43	3	613	9	24	701	4	1, 2	622
46		632	9	24, &c.	690	4	2	617
47	18	353	9	25	840	4	11	616
			9	26	996				7	8	651
			9	27	956, 1041				8	10, 11	652
			9	31	756
			10	3	302	1	8	447
1	2	119, 658, 713	10	8	146	3	5	563
1	5	656	10	8	146	3	11	327	13	40, &c.	648
1	7	214	11	2, 3	719	3	12	999
1	8	661	11	3	749	3	12	999
1	17	696	11	8	435	5	2	6, 939
1	20	695	11	31	1041	5	4	943
2		657	11	45	1128	6	16	549	1		626
2	1	326, 845	12	2	828, 1095	7	17	37	1	2	624
2	5	599	12	7	686				1	10, &c.	661
2	6, 9	694	12	9	689				5	12	640
2	11	683	12	9	689				6	17	640
2	24	510, 696	12	11	1041				7	2	640
2	27, 28	213				3	12	1039	8	3	640
2	39	684							14	8, &c.	609
2	40	684	3	2	552
2	41	679, 684	3	4	652	2	3	906
3	1	119, 684	4	12	460	2	8	348
3	2	696	9		625	3	15	285	1	1	806
3	5	630, 698	9	10	1039	3	17	1059	1	2, &c.	666
3	6	471	9	16, 17	648				1	4	666
3	12	578	10	8	1016				1	6, 11	660
3	14	684	10	14	624				1	16	666
3	15	689	11	1	879	1	1	638	2	15, 20	660
3	23, 24	685	12	3, 4	202	2	5	482	3	8	714
3	25	684, 685	12	19	938	2	9	355	4	3	659
3	27	619	13	3	507	3	3	1088	5	18, 19	659
3	28	685	13	7, 8	490				5	20, 21	739
3	29	1009	13	15	586				6	2	667, 714
3 & 6		695	14	7	349				7		633
4	8	112				1	9	730	8	1	661
4	10, &c.	699				1	13	734	8	8	661
4	17	685				2		939	9	2	202, 661
4	29	686	1	18	608	2	3	706, 717	10	21, 22	667
4	30	710	3	2	526	2	4, 5	471	13	18	666
4	32, 33	714	2	2, &c.	608	2	6, 7	679	15	8	667
4	33	715	2	10	1038	2	7	939	15	11	661
4	34	715	2	13	902	2	7, &c.	840	15	12, 13	662
4	34, &c.	715	2	16	606	2	7, 8	707	16	20	660
4	37	686	2	20	353
5		687	2	21	1059
5	2	658, 688	2	25	246, 332
5	5	688	2	28	981	3	1	1126	1	13	37
5	7	688				7	10	612	2	23, 24	36
5	10	688				9	5	1037	3	2	644
5	13	688				9	7	563	3	2, &c.	881
5	28, 30, 31	687	1	1	607-8	9	9	940, 971-2, 3	4	10, &c.	587
5	31	673	1	15	435	9	10	973	4	16, 17	587

JONAH.

MICAH.

NAHUM.

HABAKKUK.

ZEPHANIAH.

HAGGAI.

ZECHARIAH.

MALACHI.

APOCRYPHA.

I. ESDRAS.

II. ESDRAS.

TOBIT.

JUDITH.

BOOK OF WISDOM.

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
5	5	614	5	1, &c.	761, 769	5	11	756	4	15, 16	857
8	1	703	5	4, 5	769	5	22, 23	756	4	21	102
8	20	953	5	9-1	769	5	24, &c.	700, 756	4	22	889
10	7	178	5	9, 15, &c.	652	6		757	4	24	863, 875, 1055
11	20	9	5	16, 17	769	6	1	756	5	2	938
12	4, 5	375	5	21, &c.	770	6	7	753	5	22	939
12	9, 10	375	5	37, &c.	770	6	21, &c.	578	6	5, &c.	787
14	15	140	5	45, 46	782	6	24, &c.	757	6	19, 20	902
16	7	333	5	46, &c.	770	6, 7		781	6	29	533
16	13	920	5	54	771	7	9, 23	1095	7	3	949
16	20, 21	272	5	65-68	771	7	27-31	773	7	18	37
17	2, 3, 21	247	6	1, &c.	761	7	36	762	7	21, 23	335
17	7, 8	258	6	11	762	8		773	7	22	415
18	3	279	6	12, 13	762	9	5, &c.	761	7	24-27	905
19	3	270	6	17	769	9	11, 18	762	7	29	863, 905
19	7, &c.	285	6	19, &c.	771	9	26	762	7	32, 33	640
			6	32	771	10	8	953	8	2	904
			6	34	753	10	10, 11	769	8	4	921
			6	44	783	10	14, 15	769	8	5	904
			6	47	771	11	1, &c.	770	8	6	865
			6	48, &c.	771	11	5	760	8	8	862
			6	55, 56	771	11	8	764	8	11	158
			7	1, &c.	772	11	10	764	8	12	914
			7	8-20	772	11	24, 25	770	8	14	1089
			7	23, 24	772	12	2	775	8	20	910
			7	26-29	772	12	2, &c.	770	8	22	26, 910
			7	27	152	12	20-23	770	8	28	911
			7	31	1092	12	27, 28	770	8	29	945
			8	16	782	13		771	8	55	1018
			8	30, 31	760	13	2	441	9	1	353
			9	1, &c.	773	13	15, &c.	771	9	2	865
			9	28-33	773	13	23	771	9	5	866
			9	43-53	773	14	1, 2	772	9	6	901, 904
			9	55-58	865	14	3	772	9	9	866
			9	58-61	774	14	12-25	772	9	12, 13	959
			9	69-73	774	14	42	783	9	15	885
			10	9-77	775	29		792	9	17	451
			10	15-20	774	36		794	9	18-34	987
			10	25, &c.	774	49		797	9	20	919
			10	31	1041				9	24	913
			10	54	775				9	30	921
			10	65	775				9	34	830
			10	67	775				10	1	863, 875
			10	88, 89	775				10	3	1058
			11	1-5	775				10	4	856, 940
			11	13	776				10	5	1068
			11	20, 47	776	1	1	939	10	8	914
			11	47-52	776	1	1-16	869	10	16	854, 1121
			11	53	776	1	6, 7	486	10	17	226
			11	54-56	776	1	7	546	10	18	1004
			11	57-59	776	1	7-12	533	10	17	1066
			11	64	776	1	12	868	10	23	903, 1066
			12	39-52	776	1	15	939	10	24	391
			13	12-19	776	1	22	879, 1063	10	30	1051
			13	25-30	777	1	23	878	10	37	959
			13	34-42	777	2	1	939	11	2, &c.	982
			13	51	971	2	1, &c.	943	11	3, 4, 5	987
			14	4	778	2	1, 5	846	11	5	670
			14	7-33	777	2	2	327	11	17	906
			14	19	766	2	3, &c.	938	11	18	867
			15	2-5	777	2	5, 6	939	11	21	919
			15	30-36	778	2	6	846	11	23	857
			16	14-22	778	2	15	879	11	28	906
			16	18	778	2	16	923	11	29	1047
			40	18	778	2	22, 23	939	11	43, 44	983
			42		783	2	23	879	12	2	787
					407	3	1	939	12	7	902
						3	2	851	12	8	902
						3	4	573	12	10	865, 903, 953
						3	11	906	12	13	930
						3	12	831	12	15	903
						3	13, 14	853	12	16	864
						3	15	847	12	22	930, 934
						3	17	379, 873, 874	12	23	908
						3	17	906	12	24	830, 930
						4	4	302	12	27	1083
						4	5	956, 1041	12	31	934
						4	8	256	12	38	930
						4	13	889	12	39	864
						4	15	652, 860	12	39, 40	620

ECCLESIASTICUS.

1, 2, &c.	750
9 16	37
11 7	37
12 10, 11	450
14 17	37
17 7	36
24 26	376
25 24	37
34 2	845
35 1, &c.	50
39 1, &c.	668
41 3	37
43 11, 12	99
44 23	223
45 13	314
46 1	373
46 13, &c.	450
46 20	474
47 2	510
47 13	541
47 19, 20	540
47 23	541
48 1, &c.	574
48 4	580
48 12	604
48 13, 14	391
49 1	639
49 7	682
49 15	224
50 19, 20	841

BARUCH.

1 1, 3	681
1 11, 12	658

I. MACCABEES.

1 20, &c.	756
1 29, 30	756
1 44, &c.	756
2 1	774
2, &c.	757
2 40, 41	758
2 44, &c.	758
2 49, &c.	759
3 10	759, 775
3 13, &c.	759
3 39	782
3 39, &c.	759
3 43	766
3 46	705
3 55	766
3 56	782
4 1, &c.	760
4 23, &c.	760
4 26, &c.	760
4 49	760
4 59	953
4 60	761

II. MACCABEES.

1 13, &c.	761
2 4-9	763
3 25, &c.	755
3 25, &c.	764
3 5	775
4 7	755
4 21	775
4 29	755
5 2, 3	756
5 5, 6	756

NEW TESTAMENT.

MATTHEW.

1 1	939
1 1-16	869
1 6, 7	486
1 7	546
1 7-12	533
1 12	868
1 15	939
1 22	879, 1063
1 23	878
2 1	939
2 1, &c.	943
2 1, 5	846
2 2	327
2 3, &c.	938
2 5, 6	939
2 6	846
2 15	879
2 16	923
2 22, 23	939
2 23	879
3 1	939
3 2	851
3 4	573
3 11	906
3 12	831
3 13, 14	853
3 15	847
3 17	379, 873, 874
3 17	906
4 4	302
4 5	956, 1041
4 8	256
4 13	889
4 15	652, 860

INDEX OF SCRIPTURAL TEXTS.

1181

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
12	40	618, 621	22	31, 32	643	3	5	903	1	26, &c.	939
12	41	617	22	32	828, 1095	3	6	932	1	27	939
12	42	553	22	35	998	3	13	904	1	32	869
12	43	640	22	40	998	3	15	919	1	33	922
12	45	945	23	2	998	3	16	788	1	36, 37	183
12	46	909	23	5	787, 917	3	21	932	1	42	666
12	50	909	23	6	907	3	22	830	1	56	922
13	10, 11	958	23	16	758	4	1, 2	930	1	68	906
13	11	930	23	23	787	4	2	930	2	1	870
13	12	930	23	25	917	4	11, 12	929	2	1, 2	923
13	13	929	23	27	1091	4	12	930	2	2	870
13	17	938	23	29	638	4	13	930	2	4	846
13	30	831	23	34, &c.	611	4	39	983	2	4, 5	884
13	43	927	23	35	611	5	2	911	2	6-15	846
13	52	910	24	1, 2	1041	5	7	1077	2	7	846
13	55	909, 1109	24	15	956	5	19	912	2	8-14	846
14	1, 2	1013	24	17	526	5	22	912	2	9	880
14	2	915, 919	24	24	256	5	31	912	2	14	824
14	5	915	24	28	964	5	35, &c.	745	2	29, 30	847
14	21	922	24	36	1001	6	3	851	2	37	529
14	23	904	24	51	1001	6	13	914	2	39	848
14	25	406	25	1	929	6	14	915	2	49	850
14	34	916	25	6	886	6	20	915	2	52	850
15	6, 9	955	25	26	671	7	2	890	3	2	1009
15	11	106	25	31, &c.	977	7	32	918	3	15	852
15	13	955	26	2	906	7	34, 35	983	3	23	922
16	6	788, 915	26	6	830, 970	8	10	929	3	23-38	869
16	12	955	26	6	970	8	15	788-9, 915, 997	3	24	568
16	15, &c.	1028	26	7	970	8	23	918	3	24	130
16	17	919, 1110	26	9	1036	8	29	881	4	9	956
16	18	684, 920	26	17	1004	8	30	1028	4	12	1008
16	18, 19	920	26	24	1034	9	13	1040	4	16	745
16	21	830, 1008	26	29	581, 1006	9	17, 18	944	4	25	560
16	21, &c.	926	26	32	1025	9	20	912	4	25-27	533
16	22	921	26	33	1026	9	21, &c.	944	4	30	1143
16	23	921	26	35	1035	9	26	945	4	41	863
16	24	926	26	52	1009	9	34	945	4	59	1008
16	27	921, 926, 977	26	41	1031	9	35	945	5	10	862
16	28	921	26	43	1031	9	38	945	5	10, 11	863
17	2	303	26	63, 64	881, 1028	10	4	962	5	12	904
17	3	472	26	65	940	10	6	45	5	18, 19	526
17	5	303, 873	26	73	410	10	16	964	5	27	866, 887
17	9	881, 921, 1028	26	75	1035	10	46	1110	5	39	867
17	10	640	27		1034	11	11	994	6	9	903
17	17	944	27	5	1008	11	13	1039	6	12, &c.	904
17	56	909	27	9, 10	717	11	13, 14	1040	6	13	926
18	1	945	27	24	477	12	13	788	6	19	912
18	6	946	27	34	1017	12	28, &c.	787	6	20	904
18	18	934, 1124	27	35	940	12	33	998	6	22, &c.	954
18	55	868	27	38	940	13	28	1040	7	1	904
19	4	882	27	39, &c.	940	13	30	1001	7	12	905
19	8	100, 612	27	44	1018	13	32	1001	7	13	864
19	11	758	27	45	1019	14		906	7	14	983
19	11, 12	963	27	46	822, 940, 1031	14	1	970	7	15	922
19	12	15	27		53	14	3	970	7	20	906
19	15	1071	27	55	908	14	9	970	7	27	939
19	23	965	27	54	919	14	36	671	7	36, 38	907
19	28	775, 904	27	57	940	14	62	882, 1028	7	39	787
20	23	977, 1008, 1070	27	63	931	14	68	1006	7	43	919
20	25	1006	28	1	1086	15	21	1016	7	50	925
20	25, 26	967	28	6	940	15	23	1017	8	2	907
21	2, &c.	940	28	7	1025	15	36, 39	1060	8	10	930
21	7	971	28	11	1022	15	39	1020	8	18	929
21	8, 9	1037	28	18	977	15	40	909	8	27	911
21	9	906	28	18, &c.	1046	16	3, 4	1040	8	31	911
21	10	1037	28	19	858	16	9	1086	8	41	745
21	12	1037	28	20	990, 1027	16	15, &c.	1046	9	22	966
21	12, 13	994				16	16	858	9	28	922
21	21	999				16	18	1110	9	31	559, 927
21	28	996				16	20	889	9	32	944
21	32	996	1	3	870				9	33	926
21	33	996	1	5	890				9	35	589
21	34	1040	1	27	863				9	44	966
21	42	904	1	34	863, 875	1	2	891	9	45	945
22	2	886, 996	2	4	865	1	9	529	9	46, 47	945
22	11	886, 959	2	14	887	1	15	906	9	51	957
22	16	788	2	25	448	1	18	842	9	54	903
22	20	998	2	27	377, 902	1	19	946	9	57	910
22	30	1055	2	27, 28	902	1	20	842	10	9	950

MARK.

LUKE.

INDEX OF SCRIPTURAL TEXTS.

1183

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
3	24	362	13	5	889	23	9	1061	11	34	48
4	1, 2	1095	13	15	862	23	17	1013	12	13	150
4	2	1061	13	15, 42, 44	829	24	6	1013	12	16	1047
4	4	830, 990	13	16	744	24	6, 7	768	12	19	932
4	19, 20	1035	13	19, 20	396	24	15	922	13	2	967
4	31, 35	1120	13	20	433, 500	24	27	833	13	13	1047
4	36	1069	13	21	396, 499-500	26	7	652	14	2, 3, 13, 19	109
5	3, 4	854	13	23	941	26	9	1091	14	4	465
5	4	965	13	42, &c.	107	26	10	1000	14	14	106
5	5-10	836	13	45, &c.	107	26	24	933	14	17	106
5	15, 16	985	13	42-50	960	26	25	103	15	19	1086
5	18	1060	13	46	914, 1024	27	5	1072, 1096	15	20	1073
5	18, 40	967	13	51	744	27	9	1096	16	4	1080
5	19, 23	1045	14	1-3	829	27	14, &c	1097	16	17	1122
5	29	1035	14	9	987	27	24	620	16	23	1083
5	29, &c.	768	14	15	1077	27	33	1097
5	36	963, 1117	14	26	1071, 1074	28		1098
5	36, 37	955	15	2	1091	28	1	1098
5	41	1035	15	5	105, 1073	28	3	950	1	12	859
6	3	1058, 1062	15	8	1081	28	3, &c.	1112	1	17	859
6	9	1067	15	10	642, 906	28	5	1027	1	21	609
6	22, &c.	768	15	19-22	107	28	6	332, 684	1	23	928
7	2-37	1115	15	20	104	28	15	1115	1	26, &c.	609
7	4	123	15	21	585	28	23, &c.	1081	1	27	183, 931
7	14	219	15	22	1074	28	26, 27	930	1	27, &c.	391
7	15, 16	269, 1116	15	29	105	28	30, 31	1102, 1107	1	30	928
7	16	102, 373	15	33	854				2	1, &c.	609
7	22	239, 241, 696	15	41	1067				2	1, 2	927
7	25	250, 251	16	3	1075				2	2	1029
7	37, 38	1116	16	4, 5	107	1	4	873	2	3	1127
7	39-50	1116	16	5	1102	1	11, 12	1115	2	4	1073
7	42, 43	304	16	9	1076	1	21, 23	57	2	4, 5	931
7	45	361	16	10	891, 1106	1	21, 23, 25	263	2	7	1124
7	47-50	533	16	11, 12	1076	1	22, 23	139, 250	2	10, 12, 13	836
7	53	274	16	13	384	1	25	1028	2	11	1120
7	59	1000	16	23	1000	1	26, 27	545	3	3	967
7	60	913	17	1	941, 1053	1	27	150	3	6	1082
8		335	17	1-4	829	1	29	1054	3	7	1082
8	26	1064	17	2, 8	1050	1	32	330	3	11	920
8	27, &c.	829	17	21	1079	2	6, &c.	1123	3	16	7
8	39	1065	17	26	45	2	7, &c.	1052	3	16	858
8	39, 40	574	17	28	1036	2	13	1123	3	21-23	836
9	1	1000	18	6	1081	2	28, 29	173, 377	4	17	1049
9	3	1068	18	24	1103	3	2	64	4	21	967
9	6	1119	19		60	3	9, 19, 23	40	5	4, 5	1124
9	15	1119	19	4	852, 1082	3	19	617	5	5	307, 953, 954, 967
9	26	1119	19	5, 6	852	3	29	105	5	7	313
9	28	1090	19	9	1082	4	11	172	5	9	1084
9	29	1061	19	11	912	4	19, 20, &c.	842	6	9	150
9	31	1102	19	11, 12	985	4	25	828	6	15	504
9	32-43	836	19	16	671	5	1	1005	6	19, 20	201
10		829, 920, 933	19	21, 22	1106	5	12	28	6	20	306
10	9	1059	19	24	539, 637, 1105	5	14, 18	36	7	2	882
10	13, 14	670	19	33	1125, 1085	5	18	1056	7	10	1034
10	26	684	20	3, 4	1106	5	21	1056	7	1, &c.	15
10	28	1069	20	4, 6, 13	1107	6	1	1123	7	16	735
10	30	1059	20	23	993, 1088	6	14	33	7	19	1120
10	34, 35	184	20	25	1106	6	19	157	7	20	105
10	35	861	20	28	1087	7	18, &c.	715	7	26	963
10	38	982	20	29	1088	7	21, 23	056	8	4	58
10	38, &c.	987	20	34	1126	8	1	1123, 1047	8	8	105, 106
10	41	1006, 1025, 1045	21	11	554	8	15, &c.	1056	8	11	106
10	45	1068	21	20, &c.	1121	8	15, 16	1004	8	13	1123
11	3	847, 1068	21	20, 21	1069	8	29	24, 878	9	4	213
11	16	859	21	20-26	1075	8	33, 34	590	9	5	1089
11	19	1068	21	22	1090	8	35	589	9	11	908, 1070
11	20	105	21	33	1099	9	3	617, 954	9	13	1126
11	28	1091	22	3	942	9	4	620	9	18	1126
12	1	1000	22	4	1000	9	5	914	9	19, &c.	1075
12	6, 7	1099	22	4, &c.	768	9	20, 21	10	9	19, 20, 22	105
12	6, 7, 10	1045	22	4, 5	1013	10	9	1043	10	4	272, 948
12	12	889, 1057	22	9	1065	10	17	48	10	6	178
12	15	640	22	10	1119	10	18	1000	10	8	318
12	25	889	22	14	1119	11	8	930	10	10	666
12	22	601	22	18, 21	1119	11	11	831	10	11	269
13		1060	22	21, 22	960	11	33	13	10	12	102
13	1	1071	22	25	1091	11	25	850	10	13	33
13	2	1087, 1120	22	25, 28	1067	11	25, 26	653	10	20, 21	108
13	3, 4	120	22	28	1090	11	33	927	10	21	1074

I. CORINTHIANS.

ROMANS.

Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page	Ch.	Ver.	Page
10	25, 28	106	1	7—9	1084	4	8	1047	2	18	1125
10	27	108	1	8, 9	555	4	13	33	3	1	1109
11	4	565	1	11, 12	832, 836, 1119	COLOSSIANS.					3	8	256, 1036
11	19	780, 1109	1	17	1066						3	16, 17	745
11	26	1005	2	3, 5	1075	3	21	1107	4	2	932, 1124
12	3	951	2	7	1074	1	7	1101	4	6, &c.	1108
12	8, &c.	980	2	9	599	1	12	589	4	8	977
12	25	931	2	11, 16	934	1	14	939	4	9	1119
12	28	967	2	12	1069	1	15	1004	4	10	1106, 1108
13	1—1	335	3	1	1084	1	16	2	4	11	832, 889, 1107
13	7	1048	3	10	1121	1	18	1020	4	11, 12	1115
13	9, 10, 12	938	3	16	113, 847	1	20	312	4	12	1091
13	12	1050	3	19	214, 312	1	26	927, 1050	4	13	1091, 1107
14	2	878	3	21	312	2	1	1100	4	14	613, 1065, 1105
15	5	1024	4	1, &c.	312	2	3	328	4	16	1108, 1115
15	6	026	4	4	839	2	10	24	4	17	1107, 1108
15	6, &c.	913	4	4, 5	313	2	11	173	4	19	1080
15	10	1086	4	13, 14	1127	2	15	25, 27	4	20	1090, 1106
15	12, &c.	1125	4	14	1076	3	2	902	4	21	1109
15	13, &c.	1125	4	24	1043	3	10	24	TITUS.
15	20	1020	5	2	1075	3	25	1100
15	20, 22	1095	5	22, 23	947	4	7, 8	1101	1	5	1106, 1119
15	24	813, 1052	6	1	493, 1048, 1124	4	9	1100	1	5, 6	1119
15	28	813	6	6	213	4	10	889, 1107	1	12	1036
15	32	1085	6	7	1123	4	10—14	891	1	12, 13	1041
15	33	1036, 1080	6	14	589	4	13	1100	2	15	106, 171
15	41, 42	979	EPHESIANS.			4	14	832	2	10, 14	1057
15	45	45				4	18	1106	2	11, &c.	944
15	49	24	2	2	588, 908	I. THESSALONIANS.
15	50	589	2	3	40, 1056
15	52	60	2	13, 18	878	2	13	1027	3	5	1082
19	19, &c.	1120	2	15	1121	2	16	960	3	10	1119
II. CORINTHIANS.			2	19	1122	3	5	854	3	12	1101
			2	20	904, 920, 934	4	4, 5	1054
1	8, &c.	1085	2	21	934	4	15, &c.	1128	PHILEMON.
1	8, 9	1127	2	44	617	5	12	967
2	16	932	3, &c.	5, 6	1069	II. THESSALONIANS.
3	5	203	3	8	1072
4	3, 4	1052, 1128	3	9, &c.	863	1	9	1056	5, 6	1100
4	5	967	3	18, 19	927	2, &c.	9	1127	9	1106
4	6	820	4	2	1089	2	9	256	10, 12	1100
4	7	609	4	8	1046	2	10, 11	935	11	1100
5	1	7	4	10	1027	2	11	615	23	1101
5	15	955	4	11	990	HEBREWS.
5	19	878	4	11, &c.	932
5	21	312	4	11, 12	836	I. TIMOTHY.
6	14	58, 735	4	18	141
6	15	326	4	18, 19	1053	1	2	1119	1	3	21, 312
6	16	858	4	19	1046	1	3	1106, 1119	1	14	946, 978
7	11	554	4	23, 24	24	1	13	1091	2	14	987
8	9	908	4	26	932	1	19	1125	2	18	875
8	11	965	4	31, 32	1048	1	20	1085, 1105	3	2	328, 765
8	18	892	5	1	24	2	1	1119	3	5	334
10	6	997	5	2	97	2	6	955	4	8	361
10	8	1124	6	10, 11, 12	201	2	8	1055	4	15	875, 1035
10	12	736	6	20	1106	2	14	37	5	4	48, 324
10	10	1073, 1108, 1127	6	21, 22	1101	3	1, 2, &c.	1119	7	2	524
11		1085	PHILIPPIANS.			3	2	150	7	18	313
11	2	253				1	1	1107	3	14	1106	7	26, 27
11	3	37	1	7	1005, 1106	4	1, 3	106	8	1, 2	312
11	7	736	1	21, 22	587	4	4, 5	106	8	6	328
11	8, &c.	736	1	23	1052	5	17	1119	9	4	302, 535, 706
11	9	1126	1	25, 26	1106	5	19	1119	9	12	1027
11	21	308	1	25—27	1087	5	20	1119, 1124	9	13	306
11	23, &c.	1073, 1127	2	2	1119	6	17	965	9	13, 14	313
11	24	781	2	3	1047	6	20	1128	9	14	1033
11	32, 33	1096	2	6	189	II. TIMOTHY.
12	2	60, 303	2	6, &c.	1028
12	2, &c.	588	2	8, 9	872	1	8	1106	9	25	924
12	7	580, 588, 1127	2	9	1030, 1033	1	10	828	9	26	312
12	9, 10	1127	2	21	1087	1	17	1107	9	39, 40	306
12	11	1126	3	13, 14	910	1	10	1107	10	1	312, 924, 1056
13	2, 3	588	3	21	925, 1052	2	2	1119	10	4	49
GALATIANS.			4	6	051	2	2	1119	10	19	1020
			1	1	904, 1071, 1119	2	6	1004	10	25	861
1	6	1034	4			2	15	932	10	34	1103, 1054
									10	37, &c.	906

DIRECTIONS FOR PLACING THE MAPS AND PLATES.

	Page
Portrait of Stackhouse, to face Title.
Chrono-genealogical Chart of the First Age of the World,	73
do. Second, do.	110
World, showing the Dispersion and Settlement of the Nations,	121
Canaan, adapted to the Book of Genesis,	143
Chrono-genealogical Chart of the Third Age of the World,	267
Tabernacle, Altar of Burnt Offerings, and Brazen Laver,	275
Journeyings of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan,	288
Canaan, adapted to the Books of Joshua and Judges,	363
Judah and Israel, Illustrating the Books of Kings, &c.	503
Place of the temple at Jerusalem,	529
Chrono-genealogical Chart of the Fourth Age of the World,	532
Dominions of David and Solomon,	556
Chrono-genealogical Chart of the Fifth Age of the World,	664
Chrono-genealogical Chart of the Sixth Age of the World,	804
The World as known to the Ancients,	806
Syria, North and South Parts of,	821
Palestine, Illustrating the New Testament,	840
Travels and Voyages of St Paul,	1066

BS635 .S77 1838

A history of the Holy Bible from the

Princeton Theological Seminary Speer Library

1 1012 00050 3336